Laterite. s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found of two distinct types: viz. (1). High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps extended at one time over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahl and Monghyr hills. (2). Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Newbold, in J. R. A. S., vol. viii.; and Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. xlv. seqq., 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as kunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called Cabook (q.v.).

1800. "It is diffused in immense masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malayala. . . . It very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. . . . As it is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (Micacullee). . . . The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Lateritis, the appellation that may be given it in science."—Buchanan, Mysore, &c. ii. 440-441.

1860. "Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detrition communicates its hue to the soil."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

Lattee, s. A stick; a bludgeon, often made of the male bamboo (Dendrocalamus strictus), and sometimes bound at short intervals with iron rings, forming a formidable weapon. The word is Hind. lāṭhī and lathī, Mahr. laththa. This is from Prakrit lathṭhī for Sansk. yashṭi, 'a stick,' according to the Prakrit grammar of Vavaruchi (ed. Cowell, ii. 32); see also Lassen, Institutions, Ling. Prakrit, 195.

1830. "The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. I took one as a curiosity, which had been seized on a man in a fight in a village. It is a very heavy lathī, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner. There are 6 jagged semicircular irons at the top, each 2 inches in length, 1 in height, and it is shod with iron bands 16 inches deep from the top."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, vol. i., p. 133.

1878. "After driving some 6 miles, we came upon about 100 men seated in rows on the road-side, all with latties."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 114.

Latteeal, s. Hind. lāṭhīyāl, or, more cumbrously, lāṭhīwālā, 'a clubman,' a hired ruffian. Such gentry were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1878. "Doubtless there were hired latties . . . on both sides."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

Lecque, s. We do not know what the word used by the Abbé Raynal in the following extract is meant for. It is perhaps a mistake for last, a Dutch weight.

1770. "They (Dutch at the Cape) receive a still smaller profit from 60 lecques of red wine, and 80 or 90 of white, which they carry to Europe every year. The lecque weighs about 1,200 pounds."—Raynal (E. T., 1777) i. 231.

the modern li as  $\frac{1}{10}$  of a league, which gives about 3 li to the mile; more exactly, according to Mr. Giles,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  li = 10 miles; but it evidently varies a good deal in different parts of China, and has also varied in the course of ages. Thus in the 8th century, data quoted by M. Vivien de St. Martin, from Père Gaubil, show that the li was little more than  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an English mile. And from several concurrent statements we may also conclude that often the li is generalised so that a certain number of li, generally 100, stand for a day's march.

1585. "By the said booke it is found that the Chinos haue amongst them but only three kind of measures; the which in their language are called li, pu, and icham, which is as much as to say, or in effect, as a furlong, league, or iorney: the measure, which is called li, hath so much space as a man's voice on a plaine ground may bee hearde in a quiet day, halowing or whoping with all the force and strength he may; and ten of these *li*s maketh a pu, which is a great Spanish league; and ten pus maketh a dayes iourney, which is called icham, which maketh 12 (sic) long leagues."—Mendoza, i. 21.

1561. "In this part of the country a day's march, whatever its actual distance, is called 100 li; and the li may therefore be taken as a measure of time rather than of distance."—Col. Sarel in J. R. Geog. Soc., xxxii. 11.

1788. "D'après les clauses du contrat le voyage d'une longueur totale de 1,800 lis, ou 180 lieues, devait s'effectuer en 18 jours."—L. Rousset, in A Travers la Chine, 237.

Leechee, Lychee, s. Chin. li-chi, and in S. China (its native region) lai-chi; the beautiful and delicate fruit of the Nephelium litchi, Cambessèdes (N. Ord. Sapindaceae), a tree which has been for nearly a century introduced from China into Bengal with success. The dried fruit, usually ticketed as lychee, is now common in London shops.

1750-52. "Leicki is a species of trees which they seem to reckon equal to the sweet orange trees. . . It seems hardly credible that the country about Canton (in which place only the fruit grows) annually makes 100,000 tel of dried leickis."—Olof Toreen, 302-3.

1824. "Of the fruits which this season offers, the finest are leeches (sic) and mangoes; the first is really very fine, being a sort of plum, with the flavour of a Frongnag grape."—Heber, i. 60.

Lemon, s. Citrus medica var. Limonum, Hooker. This is of course not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Arabic leimūn, and is, according to Hehn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both limā and nāmbū, which last at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Sansk. dictionaries give nimbūka. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limon, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. See Lime.

dom; except, indeed, that there be lemons in some places, as sweet as sugar, whilst there be other lemons sour like ours."—Frnar Jordanus, 15.

1331. "Profunditas hujus aquae plena est lapidibus preciosis. Quae aqua multum est yrudinibus et sanguisugis plena. Hos lapides non accipit rex, sed pro animâ suâ semel vel bis in anno sub aquas ipsos pauperes ire permittit. . . . Et ut ipsi pauperes ire sub aquam possint accipiunt limonem et quemdam fructum quem bene pistant, et illo bene se ungunt. . . . Et cum sic sint uncti yrudines et sanguisugae illos offendere non valent."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App., p. xxi.

c. 1333. "The fruit of the mango-tree (al-anba) is the size of a great pear. When yet green they take the fallen fruit and powder it with salt and preserve it, as is done with the sweet citron and the lemon (al-leimûn) in our country."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126.

Lemon-grass, s. Andropogon citratus, D.C., a grass cultivated in Ceylon and Singapore, yielding an oil much used in perfumery, under the name of Lemon-Grass Oil, Oil of Verbena, or Indian Melissa Oil.

Royle (Hind. Medicine, 82), has applied the name to another very fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus, L., according to him the oxyivos of Dioscorides. This last, which grows wild in various parts of India, yields Rasa Oil, alias O. of Ginger-grass or of Geranium, which is exported from Bombay to Arabia and Turkey, where it is extensively used in the adulteration of Otto of Roses.

Leopard, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sportsmen, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (F. pardus) and leopard (Felis leopardus), the latter being the smaller; though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical.

Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felis pardus).

Lewchew, Liu kiu, Loo-Choo, &c. n.p. The name of a group of islands to the south of Japan, a name much more familiar than in later years during the 16th century, when their people habitually navigated the China seas, and visited the ports of the Archipelago. In the earliest notices they are perhaps mixt up with the Japanese.

1516. "Opposite this country of China there are many islands in the sea, and beyond them at 175 leagues to the east there is one very large, which they say is the mainland, from whence there come in each year to Malaca 3 or 4 ships like those of the Chinese, of white people whom they describe as great and wealthy merchants. . . . These islands are called Lequios, the people of Malaca say they are better men, and greater and wealthier merchants, and better dressed and adorned, and more honourable than the Chinese."—Barbosa, 207.

1540. "And they, demanding of him whence he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Siam [of the settlement of the Tanaucarim foreigners, and that he came from Veniaga] and as a Merchant was going to traffic in the Isle of Lequios."—Pinto (orig. cap. x. xli) Cogan, 49.

1553. "Fernaõ Peres . . . whilst he remained at that island of Beniaga, saw there certain junks of the people called Lequios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information at Malaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandize that they brought was a great quantity of gold . . . and they appeared to him a better disposed people than the Chinese. . . ."—Barros, III. ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556. (In this year) "a Portugal arrived at Malaca, named Pero Gomez d'Almeida, servant to the Grand Master of Santiago, with a rich Present, and Letters from the Nautaquim, Prince of the Island of Tanixumaa, directed to King Johr: the third: . . . to have five hundred Portugals granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Lequio, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kintals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly. . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 188.

1615. "The King of Mashona (qu. Shashma?) . . . who is King of the westernmost islands of Japan . . . has conquered the Legues Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China."—Sainsbury, i. 447.

"The King of Shashma . . . a man of greäte power, and hath conquered the islandes called the Legues, which not long since were under the government of China. Leque Grande yeeldeth greäte store of amber grece of the best sorte, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarse cloth, as dutties and such like, per annum."—Letter of Raphe Coppindall, in Cocks, ii. 272.

Liampo, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or those who learned from them. Thus Nanking is similarly called Lanchin in publications of the same age, and Yunnan appears in Mendoza as Olam.

1540. "Sailing in this manner we arrived six dayes after at the Ports of Liampoo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant three Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce; There they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 7 or 7 other kinde of Officers [com governança de Vereadores, d' Ouvidor, d' Alcaldes, & outras seis ou sete Varas de Justiça & officios de Republica], where the Notaries underneath the publique Acts which they made, wrote thus, I, such a one, publique Notarie of this Town of Liampoo for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with as much confidence and assurance, as if this Place had been scituated between Santarem and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Duckats the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chineses . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxvi.), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders 'Ports of Liampoo' is portas, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation; the oldest document regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Reinaud) says that the ships after crossing the Sea of Sanje 'pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea; between these mountains is an opening through which the ships pass' (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under Bocca Tigris.

1553. "The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminates in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole coast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696. "These Junks commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petre, Geelongs, and other Silks."—Bowyear, in Dalrymple, i. 87.

1727. "The Province of Chequiam, whose chief city is Limpoa, by some called Nimpoa, and by others Ningpoo."—A. Ham. ii. 283.

1770. "To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junks, from Emoy, Limpo, and Canton."—Rajnal (tr. 1777), i. 249.

Likin or Lekin, s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Taiping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set apart for military purposes only—hence its common name of 'war-tax' . . . The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of the Foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin" (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as "li (i.e. i.e. a cash or 1000 of a tael)-money," because of the original rate of levy.

The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876. "Sect. III. . . (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond, . . . until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin: in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each."—Agreement of Chefoo.

1878. "La Chine est parsemée d'une infinité de petits bureaux d'octroi échelonnés le long des voies commerciales; les Chinois les nomment Li-kin. C'est la source la plus sûre, et la plus productive des revenus."—Rousset, A Travers la Chine, 221.

Lilac, s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with Anil (q.v.), and with the Sansk. nīla, 'of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)'; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes, in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form lilang; in Arab. this, modified into lilak and lilak, is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Arab. adj. lilak has the modified sense 'bleuâtre.' See a remark under Buckeye.

We may note that in Scotland the 'striving after meaning' gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the uneducated of 'lily-oak.'

Lime, s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon's egg, and one well-known delicate miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin kāghaz nimbū, or 'paper lime.' This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thin-skinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the "China Orange."

But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica var. Limetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Portuguese lima, which is from the Arab. lima. But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minshew (2d ed. 1627).

1404. "And in this land of Guilan snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (cidras e limas e naranjas)."—Clavijs, § lxxxvi.

c. 1526. "Another is the lime (limā), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen's egg, which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boils and eats its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted."—Baber, 328.

1563. "It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructus de espinho. For the lemons of these parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Bacaim; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better. . . ."—Garcia, f. 133.

c. 1630. "The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffolls, Goats, Turtle, Hens, huge Batts . . . also with . . . Oranges, Lemons, Lymes. . . ."—T. Herbert, 28.

1673. "Here Asparagus flourish, as do Limes, Pomegranates, Genitins. . . ."—Fryer, 110. ("Jenneting" from Fr. genétin).

1690. "The Island (Johanna) abounds with Fowls and Rice, with Pepper, Yams, Plantens, Bonanoes, Potatoes, Oranges, Lemons, Limes, Pine-apples, &c. . . ."—Ovington, 109.

Lingait, Lingayet, Linguit, s. Mahr. Līṅgā-ūt, a member of a Śivaite sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the līṅga in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Bāsava. They are also called Jangama, or Vīra Saiva, and have various subdivisions.

1673. "At Hubly in this Kingdom are a cast called Linguits, who are buried upright."—Fryer, 153.

This is still their practice.

Lingua is given as the name or title of the King of Columbum (Quilon, q.v.) in the 14th century, by Friar Jordanus (p. 41), which might have been taken to denote that he belonged to this sect; but this never seems to have had followers in Malabar.

Lingam, s. This is taken from the S. Indian form of the word, which in N. India is līṅga (Sansk. and Hind.), 'a token, badge,' etc., thence the symbol of Śiva which is so extensively an object of worship among the Hindus, in the form of a cylinder of stone. The great idol of Somnāth, destroyed by Mahmūd of Ghazni, and the subject of so much romantic narrative, was a colossal symbol of this kind.

In the latest quotation below, the word is used simply for a badge of caste, which is certainly the original Sanskrit meaning, but is probably a mistake as attributed in that sense to modern vernacular use. The man may have been a lingāyat (q.v.), so that his badge was actually a figure of the lingam. But this clever authoress often gets out of her depth.

1311. "The stone idols called Ling Mahādeo, which had been a long time established at that place . . . these, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. . . . Deo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had seats there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the foot of Lanka, and in that affright the lings themselves would have fled, had they had any legs to stand on."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iv. 91.

1616. "... above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions; and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousness."—Couto, Dec. VII. iii. 11.

1726. "There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam ... round the neck, or else in the hair of the head. . . ."—Valentijn, Choro. 74.

1781. "These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingham."—Hodges, 94.

1799. "I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet, a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahadeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot."—Colebrooke, in Life, p. 152.

1809. "Without was an immense lingam of black stone."—Ld. Valentia, i. 371.

1814. "... two respectable Brahmuns, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divines."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 364.

1838. "In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man's Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away."—Letters from Madras, 156.

Linguist, s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. lingua, used for an interpreter.

1554. "To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 pardaos monthly. . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 63.

"To the linguoa of this kingdom (Ormuz) a Portuguese. . . . To the linguoa of the custom-house, a bramen."—Ibid. 104.

1700. "I carried the Linguist into a Merchant's House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remora, that stop'd the Man of War from entering into the Harbour."—A. Ham. ii. 254.

1711. "Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, never a Barrel the better Her-ring."—Lockyer, 102.

1760. "I am sorry to think your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been anyway concerned in that unlucky affair that happened at the Negrais, in the month of October 1759; but give me leave to assure your Honour that I was no further concerned, than as a Linguist for the King's Officer who commanded the Party."—Letter to the Gov. of Fort St. George from Antonio the Linguist, in Dalrymple, i. 396.

1760-1810. "If the ten should presume to enter villages, public places, or bazaars, punishment will be inflicted on the linguist who accompanies them."—Regulations at Canton, from the Fankwae at Canton, p. 29.

1882. "As up to treaty days, neither Consul nor Vice-Consul of a foreign nation was acknowledged, whenever either of these officers made a communication to the Hoppo, it had to be done through the Hong merchants, to whom the despatch was taken by a Linguist."—The Fankwae at Canton, p. 50.

Lip-lap, s. A vulgar and disparaging nickname given in the Dutch Indies to Eurasians, and corresponding to Anglo-Indian Chee-chee (q.v.). The proper meaning of lip-lap seems to be the uncoagulated pulp of the coco-nut (see Rumphius, bk. i. ch. 1.).

Long-cloth, s. The usual name in India for (white) cotton shirtings, or Lancashire calico; but first applied to the Indian cloth of like kind exported to England, probably because it was made of length unusual in India; cloth for native use being ordinarily made in pieces sufficient only to clothe one person. Or it is just possible that it may have been a corruption or misapprehension of lungi (see loonghee).

1727. "Saderass, or Saderass Patam, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth."—A. Ham. i. 358.

1785. "The trade of Fort St. David's consists in long-cloths of different colours."—Curraçiole's L. of Olive, i. 5.

1805. "Long-cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics."—Waring, Tropical Resident, p. 111.

1880. "A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long-cloth."—Pall Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

Long-drawers, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas, (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outfitters' lists.

1711. "The better sort wear long Drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Callico, thrown loose over the Shoulders."—Lockyer, 57.

1774. "... gave each private man a frock and long-drawers of chintz."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 100.

1780. "Leroy, one of the French hussars, who had saved me from being cut down by Hyder's horse, gave me some soup, and a shirt, and long-drawers, which I had great want of."—Hon. John Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iv. 266.

1810. "For wear on board ship, pantaloons . . . together with as many pair of wove cotton long-drawers, to wear under them."—Williamson, V. M., i. 9.

See Pyjamas, Shulwaurs, and Mogul Breeches, and also Sirdrawers.

Long-shore wind, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837. "This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of sham sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular cheat upon the new-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one."—Letters from Madras, 73.

Lontar, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on, are called lontar-leaves. Filet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontar as the Malay name of two palms, viz., Borassus flabelliformis (see palmyra and brab), and Livistona tundifolia.

Loocher, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a black-guard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchchā, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with lūtiya. See under Lootee.

Loonghee, s. Hind., perhaps originally Pers. lung and lunggi. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapt once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahomedans in India.

The Qanoon-e-Islam further distinguishes between the Lunggi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India.

1633. "Longui est vne petite pièce de linge, dont les Indiens se servent à cacher les parties naturelles."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 529. But in the edition of 1657 it is given: "Longui est vn morceau de linge dont l'on se sert au bain en Turquie" (p. 547).

1673. "The Elder sat in a Row, where the Men and Women came down together to wash, having Lungies about their Wastes only."—Fryer, 101.

1726. "Silk Longis with red borders, 160 pieces in a pack, 14 cobidos long and 2 broad."—Valentijn, v. 178.

1727. ". . . For some coarse chequered Cloth, called Cambaya Lungies (see Combay), made of Cotton-Yarn, the Natives would bring Elephant's Teeth."—A. Ham. i. 9.

(In Pegu) "Under the Frock they have a Scarf or Lungee doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle. . . ."—Ibid. ii. 49.

c. 1760. "Instead of petticoats they wear what they call a loongee, which is simply a long piece of silk or cotton stuff."—Gros, i. 143.

c. 1809-10. "Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee."—F. Buchanan, Puraniya, in Mont. Martin, iii. 102.

Loot, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lūt; and that from Sansk. lotra, for loptra, root lup, 'rob, plunder'. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary of 1788, as "Loot—plunder, pillage." It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean war (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognized constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Nautical Glossary (1867), thus, "Loot, plunder, or pillage, a term adopted from China."

1545. St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal admonishing him from encouraging any friend of his to go to India seems to have the thing Loot in his mind, though of course he does not use the word: "Neminem patiaris amicorum tuorum in Indiam cum Praefectura mitti, ad regias pecunias, et negotia tractanda. Nam de illis vere illud scriptum capere licet: 'Delectantur de libro viventium et cum justis non scribantur.' . . . Invidiam tantum non culpam usus publicus detrahit, dum vix dubitatur fieri non male quod impune fit. Ubique, semper, rapitur, congeritur, auferitur. Semel captum nunquam redditur. Quis enumeret artes et nomina praedarum? Equidem mirari satis nequeo, quot, praeter usitatos modos, insolitis flexionibus inaspicatum illud rapiendi verbum quaedam avaritiæ barbaria conjuget!"—Epistolæ, Prague, 1667, Lib. v. Ep. vii.

1842. "I believe I have already told you that I did not take any loot—the Indian word for plunder—so that I have nothing of that kind, to which so many in this expedition helped themselves so bountifully."—Colin Campbell to his Sister, in L. of Ld. Clyde, i. 120.

"In the Saugor district the plunderers are beaten whenever they are caught, but there is a good deal of burning and 'looting,' as they call it."—Indian Admin. of Lord Ellenborough. To the D. of Wellington, May 17, p. 194.

1858. "There is a word called 'loot,' which gives, unfortunately, a venial character to what would in common English be styled robbery."—Ld. Elgin, Letters and Journals, 215.

1860. "Loot, swag or plunder."—Slang Dict. s. v.

1864. "When I mentioned the 'looting' of villages in 1845, the word was printed in italics as little known. Unhappily it requires no distinction now, custom having rendered it rather common of late."—Admiral W. H. Smyth, Synopsis, p. 52.

1875. "It was the Colonel Sahib who carried off the loot."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

1876. "Public servants (in Turkey) have vied with one another in a system of universal loot."—Blackwood, No. cxix. p. 115.

1878. "The city (Hongkong) is now patrolled night and day by strong parties of marines and Sikhs, for both the disposition to loot and the facilities for looting are very great."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 34.

1883. "'Loot' is a word of Eastern origin, and for a couple of centuries past the looting of Delhi had been the daydream of the most patriotic among the Sikh race."—Bos. Smith's Life of Lord Lawrence, ii. 245.

"At Ta li fu . . . a year or two ago, a fire, supposed to be an act of incendiarism, broke out among the Tibetan encampments which were then looted by the Chinese."—Official Memo. on Chinese Trade with Tibet, 1883.

1757. "A body of their Louchees, or plunderers, who are armed with clubs, passed into the Company's territory."—Orme, ii. 129 (ed. 1803).

1782. "Even the rascally Looty wallahs, or Mysorean hussars, who had just before been meditating a general desertion to us, now pressed upon our flanks and rear."—Munro's Narrative, 295.

1792. "The Colonel found him as much dismayed as if he had been surrounded by the whole Austrian army, and busy in placing an ambuscade to catch about six looties."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life.

1792. "This Body (horse plunderers round Madras) has been branded generally by the name of Looties, but they had some little title to a better appellation, for they were . . . not guilty of those sanguinary and inhuman deeds. . . ."—Madras Courier, Jan. 26.

b. A different word is the Ar. Pers. lūṭīy, bearing a worse meaning, 'one of the people of Lot,' and more generally 'a blackguard.'

The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, common enough among many Asiatics, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chāukī-āukī (for chairs and tables), naukar-chākar (where both are however real words), 'servants,' 'lakri-akrī,' 'sticks and staves,' and so forth. Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawām-ud-Daulat, a Shirāzi, was asked by the Shāh:

"Why is it, Kawām, that you Shirāzis always talk of Kabob-mabob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word; is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shirāz does so, only the lūṭī-putī says it!"

Loquat, Loquat, s. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalized in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespolu giapponese (Japan medlar). It is Eriobotrya japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kūh, pron. at Canton lu-kwat, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

1878. ". . . The yellow loquat, peach-skinned and pleasant, but prodigal of stones."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49.

c. 1880. "A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but 'the phenomenon' is now on view at Richmond.* We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries. . . ."—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

Lorcha, s. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having the hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew. The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto's passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view.

1540. "Now because the Lorch (lorcha), wherein Antonio de Faria came from Patana leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel . . . and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk . . . drew much water, so that fearing the Sands . . . he sent Christovano Borralho with 14 Soldiers in the Lorch up the River. . . ."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlii.), Coggin, p. 50.

"Cō isto nos partemos deste lugar de Laito muyto embandeirados, com as gaviás toldadas de paños de seda, et os juncos e lorchas cō duas ordens de paveses por banda."—Pinto, ch. lviii. z.e. "And so we started from Laito all dressed out, the tops draped with silk, and the junks and lorchas with two tiers of banners on each side."

1856. " . . . Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned lorcha at Canton. The lorcha 'Arrow,' employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Boulger, H. of China, iii. 396 (1884).

Lory, s. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nūri, a 'parrot;' but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Luillier below). The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrots.'

c. 1330. "Parrots also, or popinjays, after their kind, of every possible colour, except black, for black ones are never found; but white all over, and green, and red, and also of mixed colours. The birds of this India seem really like the creatures of Paradise."—Friar Jordanus, 29.

c. 1430. "In Bandan three kinds of parrot are found, some with red feathers and a yellow beak, and some parti-coloured which are called Nori, that is brilliant."—Conti, in India in the XVI. Cent., 17.

The last words, in Poggio's original Latin, are: "quos Noros appellant hoc est lucidos," showing that Conti connected the word with the Pers. nūr = "lux."

1516. "In these islands there are many coloured parrots, of very splendid colours: they are tame, and the Moors call them nure, and they are much valued."—Barbosa, 202.

1555. "There are hogs also with horns (see Babiroussa), and parats which prattle much, which they call Noris."—Gálvano, old E. T., in Hak., iv. 424.

1673. " . . . Cockatoos and Newries from Bantam."—Fryer, 116.

1698. "Brought ashore from the Resolution . . . a Newry and four yards of broad cloth for a present to the Havildar."—In Wheeler, i. 333.

1705. "On y trouve de quatre sortes de perroquets, scavoir, perroquets, lauris, peruches, & cacatoris."—Luillier, 72.

1809. "Twas Camdeo riding on his lory,
Kehama, x. 19.

1817. "Gay sparkling loories, such as gleam between The crimson blossoms of the coral-tree
In the warm isles of India's summer-sea."
Mokanna.

Lota, s. Hind. lotā. The small spheroidal brass pot which Hindus use for drinking, and sometimes for cooking. This is the exclusive Anglo-Indian application; but natives also extend it to spherical pipkins of earthenware (chatties or ghurras).

1810. " . . . a lootah, or brass water-vessel."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 284.

Lote, s. Mod. Hind. lot, being a corruption of Eng. 'note.' A bank-note; sometimes called bānklot.

Loutea, s. Loytia, &c. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it.

"It would seem almost certain that this is the word given as follows in C. C. Baldwin's Manual of the Foochow Dialect:

"Lo-tia . . . (in Mandarin Lao-tyé) a general appellation for an officer. It means 'Venerable Father.'" (p. 215).

"In the Court dialect Ta-lao-yé, 'Great Venerable Father,' is the appellation used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The ye of this expression is quite different from the tyé or tia of the former" (Note by M. Terrien de la Couperie).

Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglas's Amoy Dict., adds:

"It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-mu-kuan, 'Parental Officers' (lit. 'Father-and-Mother Officers') and it is very likely that the expression 'Old Papa' is intended to convey the same idea of paternal government."

c. 1560. "Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignitie by the King, is called Louthia, which is to say with us Señor."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

"I shall have occasion to speake of a certain Order of gentlemen that are called Loutea; I will first therefor expound what this word signifieth. Loutea is as much as to say in our language as Syr . . ."—Galeotto Pereyra, by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii.

1585. "And although all the Kinge's officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, be generally called by the name of Loytia; yet euerie one hath a speciall and a particular name besides, according vnto his office."—(Parke's Mendoza, ii. 101).

1598. "Not any Man in China is esteemed or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but onely for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serve at every towne, and have the government of the same. They are called Loitias and Mandorjins."—Linnschoten, 39.

1681. "They call . . . the lords and gentlemen Loytias . . ."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 26.

Love-bird, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lorikeet, Loriculus vernalis, Sparrman, called in H. latkan or 'pendant,' because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

Lubbye, Lubbee, s. A name given in S. India to certain Mahommedan people; often peddlers who go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

In Ceylon it seems to have a different application (see below).

C. P. Brown says the word is merely a Tamil mispronunciation of 'Arabi'.

1810. "Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Concan; the others to the eastward of C. Comorin; the descendants of the former are the Nevayets; of the latter the Lubbé; a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic particle (a modification of Lubbeik) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbé pretend to one common origin with the Nevayets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives; but the Nevayets affirm that the Lubbé are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certainly in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1836. "Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Cholias; and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible; for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affix to the proper names of some of their chief men."—Simon Casie Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J. R. As. Soc. iii. 338.

1868. "The Labbeis are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus forcibly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like. . . ."—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1869. In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Pulicat and Negapatam. Their head quarters are at Nagore, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mir Sahib. They excel as merchants, owing to this energy and industry.—In Trans. Ethn. Soc. of London, N.S. vii. 189-190.

Luckerbaug, s. H. lakrā and lakar-bāghā, 'a hyena.' The latter form is not in Shakespear or in Fallon. But it is familiar in Upper India; and it occurs in Hickey's Bengal Gazette, 1781, June 24th. In some parts the name is applied to the leopard, as the extract from Buchanan shows. This is the case among the Hindi-speaking people of the Himalaya also (see Jerdon).

It is not clear what the etymology of the name is, lakar, lakṛi meaning, in their everyday sense, a stick or piece of timber. But both in Hindi and Marhatti, in an adjective form, the word is used for 'stiff, gaunt, emaciated,' and this may be the sense in which it is applied to the hyena. Another name is harvāgh, or (apparently) 'bone-tiger,' from its habit of gnawing bones.

c. 1809. "It was said not to be uncommon in the southern parts of the district (Bhāgalpur) . . . . but though I have offered ample rewards, I have not been able to procure a specimen, dead or alive; and the leopard is called at Mungger Lakravagh."

"The hyaena or Lakravagh in this district has acquired an uncommon degree of ferocity."—Eastern India, (F. Buchanan), iii. 142-143.

Luddoo, s. H. laḍḍū. A common native sweetmeat, consisting of balls of sugar and ghee, mixt with wheat and gram flour, and with cocoanut kernel rasped.

Lumberdar, s. Hind. lambardār, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dār, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number.' "The registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue" (Carnegy). "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election" (Wilson).

Lungoor, s. Hind. langūr, from Sansk. laṅgūḷi, 'caudatus.' The great white-bearded ape, much patronized by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hunimān. The genus is Presbytes, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langar of the Prasii is P. Entellus.

c. 250. "Among the Prasii of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hyrcanian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one ignorant of the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Lataḡē (now Lataḡē is a city of the Indians) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King's order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurt anybody that they meet by the way."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1825. "An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon drawing near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Suwaris, who on the Sepoy's repeating his exclamation of the broken English 'Who goes 'ere?' said with a laugh, 'Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you!'—Heber, ii. 85.

1884. "Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise, the Bengal langur. (He) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males 'receive the charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle.' Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as shewing the origin and early disabilities of their profession."—Saturday Review, May 31, on Sterndale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

Lungooty, s. Hind. langoṭi. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower castes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhōṭi (see dhōṭy). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the "Langoth or Lungota" (as he writes) is "a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. . . . The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons. . . ." This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of langūta by Abdurrazzāk would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Mocquet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Amazon. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1422. "The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lan-koutah, which descend from the navel to above the knee."—Abdurrazāk, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526. "Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langoti, which is a piece of clout that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendent modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langoti, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langoti behind."—Baber, 333.

c. 1609. "Leur capitaine auoit fort bonne façon, encore qu'il fust tout nud et luy seul auoit vn langoutin, qui est vne petite pièce de coton peinte."—Mocquet, 77.

"They wear nothing but the langoty, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand's breadth fastened to it in front."—(Ref. lost), p. 26.

Lunka, n.p. Sansk. Laṅka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahminism. Also 'an island' in general.

—, s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the 'islands' (the local term for which is laṅka) of the Godavery Delta.

M.

Mabar, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coromandel. The word is Ar. ma'bar, 'the ferry or crossing-place.' It is not clear how this name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1203. "I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the leaves of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mabar for two dinars apiece."—Abd-Allatif, Relation de l'Egypte, p. 31.

1279-1286. In M. Pauthier's notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States including Ma-pa-rh.—(See pp. 600-605).

c. 1292. "When you leave the Island of Seilan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Maabar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1300. "The merchants export from Ma'bar silken stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearls are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Irak, Khorāsān, Syria, Russia and Europe."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1303. "In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Malik-i-Azam, Margrave of Hind, Takiū-d-dīn . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma'bar) of corruption. The King of Ma'bar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu'azzam Sirāju-d-dīn, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dīnārs, not only obtained the wealth, but the rank also of his father."—Wassif, in Elliot, iii. 45.

1310. "The country of Ma'bar, which is so distant from Delhi that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 85.

c. 1330. "The third part (of India) is Ma'bar, which begins some 3 or 4 days' journey to the eastward of Kaulam; this territory lies to the east of Malabar . . . It is stated that the territory Ma'bar begins at the Cape Kumhari, a name which applies both to a mountain and a city . . . Biyyar-dāwal is the residence of the Prince of Ma'bar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, p. 185.

We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinaud's translation of Abulfeda, absolutely, in some places, substitutes "Coromandel" for "Ma'bar." It is French fashion, but a bad one.

c. 1498. "Zu deser stat Kangerā anlen den alle Kouffscheyff die in den landen zo doyn hauen, ind licht in eyner provincie Moabar genant."—Pilgerfahrt des Ritters Arnold von Harff (a fiction-monger) p. 140.

Macao, n.p. a. The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula, and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1537. The place is called by the Chinese Ngao-män (Ngao = 'bay or inlet,' Män = 'gate.' The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-mä-ngao, 'The Bay of Ama,' i.e. of the Mother, the so-called 'Queen of Heaven,' a patroness of seamen. And indeed Amacao is an old form often met with.

c. 1567. "Hanno i Portoghesi fatta vna picciola cittade in vna Isola vicina a' i liti della China chiamato Machao . . . ma i datii sono del Rè della China, e vanno a pagarli a Canton, bellissima cittade, e'di grande importanza, distante da Machao due giorni e mezzo."—Cesare de' Federici, Ram., iii. 391.

c. 1570. "On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at . . . Lampacau, where at that time the Portugals exercised their commerce with the Chineses, which continued till the year 1557, when the Mandarins of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is; of which place (that was but a desert Iland before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Duckats, together with a Cathedral Church . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 313.

1584. "There was in Machao a religious man of the order of the barefoote friars of S. Francis, who understanding the great and good desire of this king, did sende him by certaine Portugal merchants . . . a cloth whereon was painted the day of iudgment and hell, and that by an excellent workman."—Mendoza, ii. 304.

1585. "They came to Amacao, in Iuly, 1585. At the same time it seasonably hapned that Linslan was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Amacao, certaine goodly feathers for the King."—From the Jesuit accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

1602. "Being come, as heretofore I wrote your Worship, to Macao a city of the Portugals, adjoyning to the firme Land of China, where there is a Colledge of our Company."—Letter from Diego de Pantoia in Purchas, iii. 350.

1625. "That course continued divers yeeres till the Chinois growing lessefearefull, granted them in the greater Iland a little Peninsula to dwell in. In that place was an Idoll, which still remained to be seene, called Ama, whence the Peninsula was called Amacao, that is Amas Bay."—Purchas, iii. 319.

b. Macao or Maccao was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatness. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1554. "The baar (see bahar), of Macao contains 120 bicas, each bica 100 úicals: (q. v.) . . ."—A. Nunes, p. 39.

1568. "Si fa commodamente il viaggio sino a Maccao distante da Pegu dodeci miglia, e qui si sbarca."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus. iii. 395.

1587. "From Cirion we went to Macao, &c."—R. Fitch. See quotation under Deling.

Macareo, n. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cambay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu. The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Sanskrit word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal Sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagre for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Drayton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandinavian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea."* One of the Hind. names of the phenomenon is mendhā = 'the Ram;' whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R. Drummond, the natives call it ghorā, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them."† But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted, which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak:

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Mas-

caret is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great nature-force which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness.”*

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of makara or the like; whilst both mascaret (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macrée are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though mascaret has of late begun on the Seine to supplant the old term barre, which is evidently the same as our bore. Littré can suggest no etymology for mascaret; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garonne called St. Macaire, but only to reject it. There would be no impossibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of the transfer of a French term to India in such way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littré's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dictionary, but this seems hardly final.

The vast rapidity of the flood tide in the Gulf of Cambay is mentioned by Mas'udî, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 915) i. 255; also less precisely by Ibn Batuta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the Bo. Govt. Selections, N.S. No. xxvi., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10½ knots.

1553. “In which time there came hither (to Diu) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambaya, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambaya, which were the cause of the loss of many ships.”—Barros, II. ii. cap. 9.

1568. “These Sholds (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and foure-score miles about in a straight or gulf, which they call Macarec, (Muccaréo in orig.) which is as much as to say, as a race or Tide.”—Master C. Frederick, in Hak. ii. 342.

1583. “And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (of Martaban) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard of in the way of tides, and high waters. . . . The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, inasmuch that the boat is soured from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel.”—Gasparo Balbi, ff. 91 r, 92.

1644. “. . . thence to the Gulf of Cambaya with the impetuosity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose fury strange things are told, inasmuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run.”—Bocarro, MS.

1727. “A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two Fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it overturns, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives called a Mackrea.”—A. Ham. ii. 33.

1811. Solvyns uses the word Macrée as French for ‘Bore,’ and in English describes his print as “. . . the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Macrée or tide, at the mouth of the river Ougly.”—Les Hindous, iii.

Macassar, n.p. In Malay Mang-kasar, properly the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The following quotation refers to the time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

1816. “Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1815), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant

Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependent on the de-throned Raja of Boni.<sup>3</sup>—As. Journal, vol. i. 297.

Mace, s. a. The crimson net-like mantle, which envelopes the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Macir, Macer, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The mace does not seem to be mentioned by Mas'udi; it is not in the list of aromatics, 25 in number, which he details (i. 367). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopoeia of the middle ages under the name of ķirfat-al-karanful or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahomedan at Dehli if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodaei, Comment. in Theophrastum, 992); and by the quotation from Funnell.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. basbāsa, possibly in some confusion with the ancient macir.

c. 1150. "On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Mīhrāj, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, and producing ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamom, cubeb, &c."—Edrisi, i. 89; see also 51.

c. 1347. "The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (basbāsa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."—Ibn Batutta, iv. 243.

c. 1370. "A gret Yle and a gret Contree, that men clepen Java . . . There growen alle manere of Spicerie more plentyfousliche than in any other contree, as of Gyngevere, Clowegylfres, Canelle, Zedewalle, Notemuges, and Maces. And wytethe wel, that the Notemuge bereth the Maces. For righte as the Note of the Haselle hath an Husk withouten, that the Note is closed in, til it be ripe, and after falleth out; righte so it is of the Notemuge and of the Maces."—Sir John Maundeville, ed. 1866, p. 187-188.

This is a remarkable passage for it is interpolated by Maundeville, from superior information, in what he is borrowing from Odoric. The comparison to the hazel-nut husk is just that used by Hanbury & Flückiger (Pharmacographia, 1st ed. 456).

c. 1430. "Has (insulas Java) ultra xv dierum cursu duae reperiuntur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellata, in qua nuces muscatae et maces, altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola gariofali producuntur."—Conti in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae.

1514. "The tree that produces the nut (meg) and macis is all one. By this ship I send you a sample of them in the green state."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archie. Stor. Ital. 81.

1563. "It is a very beautiful fruit, and pleasant to the taste; and you must know that when the nut is ripe it swells, and the first cover bursts as do the husks of our chestnuts, and shews the maça, of a bright vermilion like fine grain (i.e. corrus); it is the most beautiful sight in the world when the trees are loaded with it, and sometimes the mace splits off, and that is why the nutmegs often come without the mace."—Garcia, f. 129 v.-130.

1705. "It is the commonly received opinion that Cloves, Nutmegs, Mace, and Cinnamon all grow upon one tree; but it is a great mistake."—Funnell, in Dampier, iv. 179.

Mace, s. b. Jav. and Malay, mās. A weight used in Sumatra, being according to Crawford 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Achin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And Mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denominate the tenth part of the Chinese liang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candareen (q.v.).

The word is originally Skt. māsha, 'a bean,' and then 'a particular weight of gold' (comp. carat and ruttee).

1539. " . . . by intervention of this thirdsman whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mazes of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 reys, at the rate of a half cruzado the maz."—Pinto, cap. xxv.

Cogan has, "the fishermen sold me to the merchant for seven mazes of gold, which amounts in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1534. "The weight with which they weigh (at Malacca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calambugo, . . . consists of cates which contain 20 tael, each tael 16 mazes, each maz 20 cumduryms. Also one paul 4 mazes, one maz 4 cupōes (see kobang). one cupōo 5 cumduryms."—A. Nunez, 39.

1598. "Likewise a Tael of Malacca is 16 Mases."—Linschoten, 44.

1599. "Bezar sive Bazar (i.e. Bezoar, q.v.) per Masas venditur."—De Bry, ii. 64.

1625. "I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coin (Achin) . . . that is of Gold named a Mas, and is ninepence halfpennie nearest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813. Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Achin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

4	copangs	=	1 mace
5	mace	=	1 mayam
16	mayam	=	1 tale
5	tales	=	1 bancal
20	bancals	=	1 catty.

Milburn, ii. 329.

Macheen, Mahacheen, n. p. This name, Mahā-china, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Al-Birūnī uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himālaya) is Mahā-chīn. But "in later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chīn, to denote the same thing, 'Chīn and Māchīn,' a phrase having some analogy to the way Sind and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Gug and Magog, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chīn was discovered to be the eldest son of Japhet, and Māchīn his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thither, p. cxix).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Manzi as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the west, it would appear that this name was confounded with Māchīn and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klaproth, J. As., Ser. ii. tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chīn and Māchīn as N. and S. China, but this distinction never seems to have been entertained by the Hindus. Ibn Batuta sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chīn) as South China from Khūnī (see Cathay) as North China. In times when intimacy with China had again ceased, the double name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a round way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Sodor and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Māchīn to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Fra Mauro). An exceptional application arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the west as the city of Māchīn, or in Persian translation Chīn-kalān, i.e. Great Chīn.

Mahachina as applied to China:

636. "'In what country exist the kingdom of the Great Thung?' asked the king (Sīlāditya of Kanau), 'how far is it from this?'

'It is situated,' replied he (Hwen T'sang), 'to the N.E. of this kingdom, and is distant several ten-thousands of li. It is the country which the Indian people call Mahā-china.'"—Pil. Boudh. ii. 254-255.

641. See quotation under China.

c. 1030. "Some other mountains are called Harmakūt, in which the Ganges has its source. These are impassable from the side of the cold regions, and beyond them lies Māchīn."—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 46.

1501. In the Letter of Amerigo Vespucci on the Portuguese discoveries, written from C. Verde, 4th June, we find mention among other new regions of Marchin. Published in Baldelli Boni's Il Milione, p. ciii.

c. 1590. "Adjoining to Asham is Tibet, bordering upon Khatai, which is properly Mahacheen, vulgarly called Macheen. The capital of Khatai is Khan Balegh, 4 days' journey from the sea."—Ayacu, by Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 4.

Applied to Southern China:

c. 1300. "Khatāi is bounded on one side by the country of Māchīn, which the Chinese call Manzi . . . In the Indian language S. China is called Mahā-chīn, i.e. 'Great China,' and hence we derive the word Manzi."—Rashād-ud-dīn, in H. des Mongols (Quatre-viers), xci-xciii.

c. 1348. "It was the Kaam's order that we should proceed through Manzi, which was formerly known as India Maxima (by which he indicates Mahā-Chinā, see below, in last quotation).—John Mariignolli, in Cathay, p. 354.

Applied to Indo-China :

c. 1430. "Ea provincia (Ava)—Macinum incolae dicunt—... referta est elephantis."—Conti, in Poggins de Var. Fortunae.

Chin and Machin :

c. 1320. "The curiosities of Chin and Machin, and the beautiful products of Hind and Sind."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1440. "Poi si ritrova in quella istessa provincia di Zagatai Sammarcant città grandissima e ben popolata, per la qual vanno e vengono tutti quelli di Cini e Macini e del Cataio, o mercanti o viandanti che siano."—Barbaro in Ramusio, ii. f. 106v.

c. 1442. "The merchants of the 7 climates from Egypt . . . from the whole of the realms of Chin and Machin, and from the city of Khānbālīk, steer their course to this port."—Aldurrazāk, in Notices et Extraits, xiv. 429.

Mahāchin or Chin Kalān, for Canton :

c. 1030. In Sprenger's extracts from Al Birūnī we have "Sharghūd, in Chinese Sin-fū. This is Great-China (Mahāsin)"—Post and Reise-routen des Orients, 90.

c. 1300. "This canal extends for a distance of 40 days' navigation from Khānbālīk to Khingsai and Zaitūn, the ports frequented by the ships that come from India, and from the city of Machin."—Rashiduddin, in Cathay, &c., 259-260.

c. 1332. " . . . after I had sailed eastward over the Ocean Sea for many days I came to that noble province Manzi . . . The first city to which I came in this country was called Cens-Kalan, and 'tis a city as big as three Venices."—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 103-105.

c. 1347. "In the evening we stopped at another village, and so on till we arrived at Sin-Kalān, which is the city of Sin-ul-Sin . . . one of the greatest of cities, and one of those that has the finest of bazaars. One of the largest of these is the porcelain bazaar, and from it china-ware is exported to the other cities of China, to India, and to Yemen."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 272.

c. 1349. "The first of these is called Manzi, the greatest and noblest province in the world, having no paragon in beauty, pleasantness, and extent. In it is that noble city of Campsay, besides Zayton, Cynkalan, and many other cities."—John Mariignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

Māchis, s. This is recent Hind. for 'lucifer matches.' An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is divā-salūn.

Madapollam, s. This term, applying to a particular kind of cotton cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Mādhava-palam. This was till 1833 the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunka and Injeram. Madapollam is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

1673. "The English for that cause (the unhealthiness of Masulipatam), only at the time of shipping, remove to Medopollon, where they have a wholesome Seat Forty Miles more North."—Fryer, 35.

c. 1840. "Pierrette eut de jolies chemises en Madapollam."—Balzac, Pierrette.

1879. " . . . liveliness seems to be the unfailing characteristic of autographs, fans, Cremona fiddles, Louis Quatorze snuff-boxes, and the like, however sluggish pig-iron and Madapollams may be."—Sat. Review, Jan. 11, p. 45.

Madrafaxao, s. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing Muzaffar-shāh. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably Muzaffar-Shah II. (1511—1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 185 grs. (Pathān Kings, 353).

1554. "There also come to this city Madrafaxaos, which are a money of Cambaya, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tangas of 60 reis the tanga, others of 23, 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Nunes, 32.

Madras, n. p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madarasen; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard.* Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Māndu-rājya, 'Realm of the Stupid.' No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthums-kunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengulee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted!" It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoy and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Mandrāj. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madraspatanam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madraspatanam as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah. The word is therefore probably of Mahommedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madrasa, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madarasa (see Faris y Sausa, Africa Portuguesa, 1681, p. 6). And the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madrasa in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century.*

Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahommedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madrasa itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient;" formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account.

c. 1665. "Le Roi de Golconde a de grands Revenus. . . Les Douanes des marchandises qui passent sur ses Terres, et celles des Ports de Masulipatan et de Madraspatan, lui rapportent beaucoup."—Thevenot, v. 306.

1672. ". . . following upon Madraspatan, other-wise called Chinnepatan, where 1673. "Let us now pass the Pale to the Heathen Town, only parted by a wide Parade, which is used for a Bazar, or Mercate-place. Madaras then divides itself into divers long streets, and they are chequered by as many transverse. It enjoys some Chovitricks for Places of Justice; one Exchange; one Payod. . . ."—Fryer, 38-39.

1726. "The Town or Place, anciently called Chinapatnam, now called Madraspatnam, and Fort St. George."—Letters Patent, in Charters of E. I. Company, 368-9.

1727. "Fort St. George or Maderass, or as the Natives call it, China Patam, is a Colony and City belonging to the English East India Company, situated in one of the most incommodious Places I ever saw. . . . There is a very good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-Stables are neat, but the old College, where a great many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is kept in ill Repair."—A. Ham. i. 364. (See Fort St. George, and Chinapatam.)

Madras, s. This name is applied to large bright-coloured handkerchiefs, of silk warp and cotton woof, which were formerly exported from Madras, and much used by the negroes in the W. Indies as head-dresses. The word is preserved in French, but is now obsolete in England.

c. 1830. ". . . We found President Petion, the black Washington, sitting on a very old ragged sofa, amidst a confused mass of papers, dressed in a blue military undress frock, white trowsers, and the everlasting Madras handkerchief bound round his brows."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, p. 425.

1846. "Et Madame se manifesta! C'était une de ces vieilles dévotées par Adrien Brauer dans ses sorcières pour le Sabbat . . . coiffée d'un Madras, faisant encore papillottes avec les imprimés, que recevait gratuitement son maître."—Balzac, Le Cousin Pons, ch. xviii.

Madura, n.p. properly Madurei. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as "Μόδουρα βασιλειον Πανδιόνης." The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathura, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (v. Muttra), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* Madura was from a date at least as early as the Christian era the seat of the Pāndya sovereigns. These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolkei on the Tamraparni, the Kόλχοι of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 95, 101).

This perhaps implies an earlier spread of northern influence than we are justified in assuming.

The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Mutra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have Madura in Ceylon; the city and island of Madura adjoining Java; and a town of the same name (Madura) in Burma, not far north of Mandalé, Madeya of the maps.

A.D. c. 70-80. "Alius utilior portus gentis Neacyndon qui vocatur Becare. Ibi regnabat Pandion, longe ab emporio mediterraneo distante oppido quod vocatur Modura."—Pliny, vi. 26.

c. 1347. "The Sultan stopped a month at Fattan, and then departed for his capital. I stayed 15 days after his departure, and then started for his residence, which was at Mutra, a great city with wide streets. . . . I found there a pest raging of which people died in brief space . . . when I went out I saw only the dead and dying."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 200-201.

1311. ". . . the royal canopy moved from Birdhul . . . and 5 days afterwards they arrived at the city of Mathra . . . the dwelling-place of the brother of the Rái Sundar Pāndya. They found the city empty, for the Rái had fled with the Ránis, but had left two or three elephants in the temple of Jagnár (Jaganāth)."—Amir Khusrú, in Elliot, iii. 91.

Madura Foot. A fungoid disease of the foot, apparently incurable except by amputation, which occurs in the Madura district, and especially in places where the 'Black soil' prevails. Medical authorities have not yet decided on the causes or precise nature of the disease. See Nelson's Madura, Pt. I. pp. 91-94.

Magadoxo, n.p. This is the Portuguese representation, which has past into general European use, of Makdashau, the name of a town and state on the Somali Coast in E. Africa, now subject to Zanzibar.

It has been shown by one of the present writers that Marco Polo, in his chapter on Madagascar, has made some confusion between Magadoxo and that island, mixing up particulars relating to both. It is possible that the name of Madagascar was really given from Makdashau, as Capt. Burton supposes; but he does not give any authority for his statement that the name of Madagascar "came from Makdishú (Magadoxo) . . . whose Sheikh invaded it."—Comment. on Camões, ii. 520.

c. 1330. "On departing from Zaila, we sailed on the sea for 15 days, and then arrived at Makdashau, a town of great size. The inhabitants possess a great number of camels, and of these they slaughter (for food) several hundreds every day."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 181.

1498. "And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories, and in the midst of the city certain great palaces; and about it a wall with four towers; and this city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. And when we were come well abreast of it, we discharged many bombards (at it), and kept on our way along the coast with a fine wind on the poop."—Roteiro, 102.

1514. ". . . The most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla . . . and these people continue to be found in Mazambic, Melinda, Mogodecio, Marachilue (read Brava Chilve, i.e. Brava and Quiloa), and Mombazza; which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own; except Mazambich."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.

1516. "Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—Barbosa, 16.

1532. ". . . and after they passed Cape Guardafu, Dom Estevão going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—Conto, IV., viii. 2.

1727. "Magadoxa, or as the Portuguese call it, Magadocia, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorn'd with many high Steeples and Mosques."—A. Ham. i. 12-13.

Mahájun, s. Hind. from Sansk. mahā-jan, 'Great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

"Down there lives a Mahajun—my father gave him a bill,

I have paid the knave thrice over, and here I'm paying him still.

He shows me a long stamp paper, and must have my land—must he?

If I were twenty years younger, he should get six feet by three."

Mahannah, s. See Miana, and My-anna.

Mahé, n.p. Properly Māyēli. A small settlement on the Malabar coast 4 m. south of Tetticherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

Mahi, n.p. The name of a considerable river flowing into the upper part of the Gulf of Cambay.

c. A.D. 80-90. "Next comes another gulf . . . * extending also to the north, at the mouth of which is an island called Baionēs (Perim, q.v.), and at the innermost extremity a great river called Mas."—Periplus, ch. 42.

Mahout, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. mahāwat, from Skt. mahā-mātra, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahābhārata (e.g. iv. 1761, etc.).

The Mahout is mentioned in the First Book of Maccabees as 'the Indian.' See under that word.

c. 1590. "Mast elephants (see Must). There are five and a half servants to each, viz., first a Mahawat, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements. . . "The name of Morattoes, or Marattas, is, I have reason to think, a derivation in their country-language, or by corruption, from Mar-Rajah."—Ibid. 73.

1765. "These united princes and people are those which are known by the general name of Mahrattors; a word compounded of Rattor and Maahah: the first being the name of a particular Ratapoot (or Royapoot) tribe; and the latter, signifying great or mighty (as explained by Mr. Fraser). . . ."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 105.

c. 1769. Under a mezzotint portrait: "The Right Honble George Lord Pigot, Baron Pigot of Patshul in the Kingdom of Ireland, President and Governor of and for all the Affairs of the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, on the Coast of Choromandel, and Orixá, and of the Chingee and Moratta Countries, &c., &c., &c."

c. 1842.

" . . . Ah, for some retreat Deep in yonder shining Orient, where my life began to beat;
Where in wild Mahratta battle fell my father evil starr'd."

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

Mahratta Ditch, n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the landward sides of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Mahratta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta. See Ditcher. The line of the Ditch nearly corresponded with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S.E. and S., where the work was never executed.

1742. "In the year 1742 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, round the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Sootanatty to the southern part of Govindpore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants . . . discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe Ditch."—Orme, ii. 45, ed. 1803.

1872. "The Calcutta cockney, who glories in the Mahratta Ditch . . ."—Govinda Samanta, i. 23.

Mahseer, Maseer. H. Mahasaula, Masal, &c. s. The name is applied perhaps to more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N. O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. megalopsis, McLelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. mahā-sīras, 'big-head,' or mahā-sāka 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca.*

c. 1809. "The Masal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think still better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon."—Eastern India, iii. 194.

1822. "Mahasaula and Tora, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, among the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers."—F. (Buchanan) Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873. "In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon."—H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

Maistry, Mistry, sometimes even Mystery, s. Hind. mistrī. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use.

Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman,' but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artisan, as rāj-mistrī (properly rāj, Pers.), 'a mason or bricklayer,' lohār-mistrī, 'a blacksmith,' etc.

The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artisans in Bluteau: "Artífice que sabe bem o seu officio. Peritus artifex . . . Opifex, alienorum operum inspector."

In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor (see Caleefa).

1554. "To the mestrê of the smith's shop (ferraria) 30,000 reis of salary and 600 reis for maintenance" (see batta).—S. Botelho, Tombo, 65.

1800. ". . . I have not yet been able to remedy the mischief done in my absence, as we have the advantage here of the assistance of some Madras dubashes and maistries" (ironical).—Wellington, i. 67.

Mainato, s. Tamil, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516. "There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Naires; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their

c. 1542. "In this inclosure do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynates, which wash the linnen of the City (Pequin), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 133. The original (cap. cv.) has todos os mainatos, whose sex Cogan has changed.

1554. "And the farm (renda) of mainatos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). . . ."—Tombo, &c., 53.

1644. (Expenses of Daman) "For two maynatos, three water boys (bois de agoa), one sombregro boy, and 4 torch bearers for the said Captain, at 1 xerafim each a month, comes in the year to 36,000 réis or x<sup>as</sup>. 00120.0.00."—Bocarro, MS. f. 191.

Majoon, s. Hind. from the Arab. ma'jūn, lit. 'kneaded,' and thence what old medical books call 'an electuary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but specially applied to an intoxicating confection of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazar. In the Deccan the form is ma'jūm. Mooden Sheriff, in his Suppt. to the Pharmac. of India writes naghjūn.

"The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (datūra), the powder of nux vomica, and sugar."—Qanoon-e-Islam, Glos. lxxxiii.

1519. "Next morning I halted . . . and indulging myself with a maajūn, made them throw into the water the liquor used for intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish."—Baber, 272.

1563. "And this they make up into an electuary, with sugar, and with the things above-mentioned, and this they call maju."—Harari, f. 27r.

1781. "Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majum each, and obliged us to eat it . . . a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Caffres, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed."—Soldier's letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Mysore, Lives of Lindseys, iii. 293.

1874. ". . . it (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majum of a green colour."—Hanbury and Fluckiger, 493.

Malabar, n.p. a. This name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Λιμύρις, or rather Διμύρις, of the Greeks (see under Tamil), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Mulai, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravidian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malaya, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghats, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayālam, distinguishing that branch of Dravidian language which is spoken in the tract which we call Malabar.

This name—Male or Mulai, Maliah, &c.,—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India: whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malai-nādu (nādu = 'country'). The affix bār appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian?) termination, bār, whatever be its origin, and whether or no it be connected either with the Arab. barr, 'a continent,' on one hand, or with the Skt. vāra, 'a region,' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangī-bār (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kalāh-bār, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even, according to the dictionaries, Hindū-bār for India.

In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 17) it is expressly explained: "The word bār serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom."

It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malavar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form.

c. 1348-49. "We embarked on board certain junks from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—John de Marignoli, in Cathay, 356.

c. 1420-30. ". . . Departing thence he . . . arrived at a noble city called Coloen. . . . This province is called Melibaria, and they collect in it the ginger called by the natives colombi, pepper, brazil-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa."—Conti, corrected from Jones's transl. in India in XV. Cent. 17-18.

c. 1442. "The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kael), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serendib. . . . bears the general name of Melibár."—Abdurrazzák, in do. 19.

1459. Fra Mauro's great Map has Milibar.

1514. "In the region of India called Melibar, which province begins at Goa, and extends to Cape Comedis (Comorin). . . ."—Letter of Gior. da Empoli, 79. It is remarkable to find this Florentine using this old form in 1514.

1516. "And after that the Moors of Meca discovered India, and began to navigate near it, which was 610 years ago, they used to touch at this country of Malabar on account of the pepper which is found there."—Barbosa, 102.

1553. "We shall hereafter describe particularly the position of this city of Calicut, and of the country of Malabar in which it stands."—Barros, Dec. I., iv. c. 6.

In the following chapter he writes Malabar.

1554. "From Diu to the Islands of Dih. Steer first S.S.E., the pole being made by five inches, side towards the land in the direction of E.S.E. and S.E. by E. till you see the mountains of Monibár."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 461.

"Esta provincia cuja porto agora
Tomado tendes, Malabar se chama:
Do culto antigo os idolos adora,
Que cá por estas partes se derrama."
Camões, vii. 32.

By Burton:
"This province, in whose Ports your ships have tane refuge, the Malabar by name is known:
its antique rite adareth idols vain,
Idol-religion being broadest sown."

Since De Barros Malabar occurs almost universally.

1877. The form Malibar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., "Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch" to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 18th, 1877.

Malabar, n.p. b. This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed., 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A. apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see Malayalam); those under B. are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see e.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of this century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Eurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

"Leva alguns Malabares, que tomou Por força, dos que o Samorim mandara."
Camões, ix. 14.

1582. "They asked of the Malabars which wr. with him what he was?"—Castanheda (tr. by N. L.) f. 37 v.

1602. "We came to anchor in the Roade of Achen . . . where we found sixteen or eighteen saile of shippes of diuers Nations, some Gosavats, some of Bengala, some of Calecut, called Malabares, some Pegues, and some Patanyes."—Sir J. Lancaster, in Purchas, i. 153.

1606. In Gouvea (Synode, ff. 2r., 3, &c.) Malavar means the Malayalam language.

1549. "Enrico Enriquez, a Portuguese priest of our Society, a man of excellent virtue and good example, who is now in the Promontory of Comorin, writes and speaks the Malabar tongue very well indeed."—Letter of Xavier, in Coleridge's Life, ii. 73.

1718. "This place (Tranquebar) is altogether inhabited by Malabarian Heathens."—Propn. of the Gospel in the East, Pt. I. (3d ed.) p. 18.

"The Portuguese . . . sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration . . . made their acquaintance with various places on the eastern or Coromandel Coast . . . and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. . . . A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Cael, in Timorelly, on the Coromandel Coast . . . they found the King of Qulou (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there."—Ep. Caldwell, u. s.

"Two distinct languages are necessarily required; one is the Danulian, commonly called Malabarick."—Ibid., Part III. 33.

These words are adopted from Card. Tournon's decree of 1704 (see id. i. 173).

c. 1760. "Such was the ardent zeal of M. Ziegenbalg that in less than a year he attained a perfect knowledge of the Malabarian tongue. . . . He composed also a Malabarian dictionary of 20,000 words."—Grose, i. 261.

1782. "Les habitants de la côte de Coromandel sont appelés Tamouls; les Européens les nomment improprement Malabars."—Sonnecrat, i. 47.

1801. "From Niliseran to the Chandergerry River no language is understood but the Malabars of the Coast."—Sir T. Munro in Life, i. 322.

In the following passage the word Malabars is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent:

1810. "The language spoken at Madras is the Talinga, here called Malabars."—Maria Graham, 128.

1860. "The term 'Malabar' is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalese Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Mahawanso 'damilos,' or Tamils, came not only from . . . 'Malabar,' but also from all parts of the peninsula, as far north as Cuttack and Orissa."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 353.

Malabar Rites. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially among those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches.

These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de' Nobili ("Robertus de Nobilibus") who came to Madura about 1606. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation!

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1623 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—

1. The investiture of Brahmans and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge.

2. The ornamental use of sandal-wood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung-ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification.

3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification.

4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the Churches, was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (23rd June, 1704) prohibited:—

1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of 'saliva, sal, et insufflatio.' 2. The use of Pagan names. 3. The Hinduizing of Christian terms by translation. 4. Deferring the baptism of children. 5. Infant marriages. 6. The use of the Hindu tali (see talee). 7. Hindu usages at marriages. 8. Augury at marriages, by means of a coco-nut. 9. The exclusion of women from churches during certain periods. 10. Ceremonies on a girl's attainment of puberty. 11. The making distinction between Pariahs and others. 12. The assistance of Christian musicians at heathen ceremonies. 13. The use of ceremonial washings and bathings. 14. The use of cowdung-ashes. 15. The reading and use of Hindu books.

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

Malabathrum, s. There can be little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamomum, which leaf was known in Sanskrit as tamāla-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pān or betel-leaf for the malabathrum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Arab. name of the betel, tumbil, which is taken from Skt. tāmbūla, betel; tāmbūla-pattra, betel-leaf. The tamāla-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamomum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as tejpāt, or corruptly tez-pāt, i.e. 'pungent leaf.' The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of sādhaj or sādhajī Hindī, and was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Folium indicum, which will still be found in Italian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios of Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabathrum and Folium indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists. The ancients did no doubt apply the name malabathrum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract. Rheede, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Cathay, &c., pp. cxlv.-xli.).

N.B.—The name Cinnamon is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinnamomum are properly Cussia barks.

c. A.D. 60. "Μαλάβαθρον ἔνιοι ὑπολαμβάνουσιν εἶναι τῆς Ἰνδικῆς νάρδος φύλλον, πλανώμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς κατὰ τὴν ὁσμὴν, ἐμφερείας, . . . ἴδιον γὰρ ἐστὶ γένος φύσμενον ἐν τοῖς Ἰνδοῖς τέλει, φύλλον ὃν ἐπισηχόμενον ὕδατι."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. i. 11.

c. A.D. 70. "We are beholden to Syria for Malabathrum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eye withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Oile for perfumers to use. . . . And yet there commeth a better kind thereof from India. . . . The relish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that . . . the leaf yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is strange and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denier to three hundred a pound."—Pliny, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

c. A.D. 90 " . . . Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withes. And these they divide into three classes. . . . And thus originate the three qualities of Malabathrum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale."—Periplus, near the end.

1563. "R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indu, a piece of information of great value to me; for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same; and what is more, the modern writers . . . call betel in their works tambul, and say that the Moors give it this name. . . .

"O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear, for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz., in 239, which treats of folium indu, and in 707, which treats of tambul . . . and the folium indu is called by the Indians Tamalapatra, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into malabathrum," etc.—Garcia, ff. 95v, 96.

c. 1690. "Hoc Tambul seu Sirium, licet vulgatissimum in India sit folium, distinguendum est a Folio Indo seu Malabathro, Arabibus Cadeyi Hindi, in Pharmacopoeis, est Indic, Tamala-patra et folio Indo dicto. . . . A nostra autem natione intellexi Malabathrum nihil aliud esse quam folium canellae, seu cinnamomi sylvestris."—Rumphius, v. 337.

c. 1760. "... quand l'on considère que les Indiens appellent notre feuille Indienne tamalapatra on croit d'apercevoir que le mot Grec μαλάβαθρον en a été anciennement dérivé."—(Diderot) Encyclopédie, xx. 846.

1837. (Malatroon is given in Arabic works of Materia Medica as the Greek of Sādhaq, and tij and tej-pat as the Hindi synonyms.) "By the latter names may be obtained everywhere in the bazars of India, the leaves of Cinn. Tamala and of Cinn. albiflorum."—Royle, Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, 85.

Malacca, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D'Albuquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes some etymological connexion between Malay and Malacca. And such a connexion is put forward by De Barros and D'Albuquerque (see quotations below, and also under Malay). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of the city, which evidently refers to the Arab. mulākāt, 'a meeting.' This last, though it appears also in the Sijara Malayu, may be totally rejected. Crawford is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phyllanthus emblica (or emblic myrobalan, q.v.), "a tree said to be abundant in that locality;" and this, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eredia as the etymology. Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. amlaka, from amla, 'acid.'

1416. "There was no King but only a chief, the country belonging to Siam . . . In the year 1409, the imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and gave to the chief two silver seals. . . . he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Mo-la-ka) . . . Tin is found in the mountains . . . it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 catti 8 tael . . . ten pieces are bound together with rattan and form a small bundle, whilst 40 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading . . . they use these pieces of tin instead of money."—Chinese Annals, in Groeneveldt, p. 123.

1498. "Melequa . . . is 40 days from Qualecut with a fair wind . . . hence proceeds all the clove, and it is worth there 9 crusados for a bahar (q.v.), and likewise nutmeg other 9 crusados the bahar; and there is much porcelain and much silk, and much tin, of which they make money, but the money is of large size and little value, so that it takes 3 farazalas of it to make a crusado. Here too are many large parrots all red like fire."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 110-111.

1510. "When we had arrived at the city of Malacha, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor. . . . I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world . . ."—Varthema, 224.

1511. "This Paremicura gave the name of Malacca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Palimbão flees away they call him Malayo . . . . Others say that it was called Malacca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malacca also signifies to meet . . . Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter."—Commentaries of Alboquerque, E. T. by Birch, iii. 76-77.

1516. "The said Kingdom of Ansyane (Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malacca."—Barbosa, 191.

1553. "A son of Paramisora called Xaquem Darxa, (i.e. Sikandar Shāh) . . . to form the town of Malacca, to which he gave that name in memory of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say 'banished,' and hence the people are called Malaios."—De Barros, II. vi. 1.

"That which he (Alboquerque) regretted most of all that was lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work; and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malacca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Afonso Alboquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph on the capture of the city."—Id. II., vii. 1.

"Nem tu menos fugir poderás deste
Postoque rica, e postoque assentada
Lá no gremio da Aurora, onde nasceste, Opulenta Malacca nomeada!
Assettas venenosas, que fizeste,
Os crises, com que já te vejo armada,
Malaios namorados, Jaos valentes,
Todos farás ao Luso obedientes."

Camões, x. 44.

By Burton:

"Nor shalt thou 'scape the fate to fall his prize, albeit so wealthy, and so strong thy site there on Aurora's bosom, whence thy rise,
thou Home of Opulence, Malacca hight!
The poisoned arrows which thine art supplies,
the Krises thirsting, as I see, for fight, th' enamoured Malay-men, the Javan braves,
all of the Lusian shall become the slaves."

1612. "The Arabs called it Malakat, from collecting all merchants."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 322.

1613. "Malaca significa Mirabolanos, fructa de hua arvore, plantada ao longo de hum ribeiro chamado Aeriele."—Godinho de Eredio, f. 4.

language an adjective, Malāyu; thus orang Malāyu, 'a Malay'; tāna Malāyu, 'the Malay country'; bahasa Malāyu, 'the Malay language.'

In Javanese the word malāyu signifies 'to run away,' and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this, in reference to the alleged foundation of Malacca by Javanese fugitives (see Malacca); but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of South Indian origin, and connected with the Malāya of the Peninsula (see under Malabar).

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawford, that a name which appears on Ptolemy's tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Maulmain, is Μαλειού Κάλον, words which in Javanese (Malāyu-Kulon) would signify "Malays of the West." After this, the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the Geography of Edrisi, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Sclater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinj, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable), or of the Island of the Malagashes (Madagascar), if it is either.

We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

c. 1150. "The Isle of Malai is very great . . . The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatics and spices, such as clove, cinnamon, nard . . . and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality . . . the people also have wind-mills."—Edrisi, by Jaubert, i. 945.

c. 1273. A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Maliyi, or Maliurh, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China."—Notice by Sir T. Wade in Bourving's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292. "You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malaiur. The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spicery are to be found there."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii., ch. 8.

c. 1539. "... as soon as he had delivered to him the letter, it was translated into the Portugal out of the Malayan tongue wherein it was written."—Pinto, E. T. 15.

1548. "... having made a breach in the wall twelve fathom wide, he assaulted it with 10,000 strangers, Turks, Abyssins, Moors, Malauares, Achems, Jaos, and Malayos."—Pinto, E. T. p. 279.

1553. "And so these Gentiles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malacca as being the most general language of those parts."—Barros, III. v. 1.

"Everything with them is to be a gentleman; and this has such prevalence in those parts that you will never find a native Malay, however poor he may be, who will set his hand to lift a thing of his own or anybody else's; every service must be done by slaves."—Id. II., vi. 1.

1610. "I cannot imagine what the Hollanders meane, to suffer these Malayians, Chinesians, and Moores of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade thorow all the Indies, and forbid it their owne servants, countrymen, and Brethern, upon paine of death and losse of goods."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, I. 321.

Malayālam. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the western side of the Ghauts (or Malāya mountains), from the Chandragiri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandrum on the South (lat. 8°, 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it. Tamil, however, also intertwines with Malayālam all along Malabar. The term Malayālam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region."

Maldives, Maldive Islands, n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Nale-diva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one. The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for island which we have in the Sanskrit dvīpa and Pali dīpa. We find this reflected in the Dīvi of Ammianus, and in the Dīvi and Dībajāt (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the last century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom Divehi Rajjé, and his people Divehe mihun. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mahal-Dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mahal, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connexion with Mahal, 'a palace.' This form of the name looks like a foreign 'striving after meaning.' But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Malé, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dīves, or islands, of Malé, as Malebār (v. Malabar) was the coast-tract or continent, of Malé. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from mālā, a garland or necklace, of which their configuration is highly suggestive. Milburn (Or. Commerce, i. 335) says: "This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1507." Let us see!

c. 545. "And round about it (Sietediba or Taprobane, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c. clxxvii.

851. "Between this Sea (of Horkand) and the Sea called Lūravi there is a great number of isles: their number indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,900; . . . the distance from island to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs. They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-palms . . . The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Horkand: it is the chief of all; they give the islands the name of Dībajāt (i.e. Dības).—Relation, &c. tr. by Ruinard, i. 4-5.

c. 1030. "The special name of Dīva is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect . . . these islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product. Those of one class are called Divā-Kūzah (or the Cowry Divahs), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Divā-Kanbar, from the word kanbar (i.e. coir, q. v.), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched."—Al-Birūnī, in Reinaud, Fragmens, 124.

1150. See also Edrisi, in Jaubert's Transl. i. 68. But the translator prints a bad reading Raibihāt, for Dībajāt.

c. 1343. "Ten days after embarking at Calcutt we arrived at the Islands called Dhibat-al-Mahal . . . These islands are reckoned among the wonders of the World; there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered into a ring, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter . . . Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-palms . . . They are divided into regions or groups . . . among which are distinguished . . . 3<sup>o</sup> Mahal, the group which gives a name to the whole, and which is the residence of the Sultans."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 110 seqq.

1442. Abdurrazzāk also calls them "the isles of Divā-Mahal."—In Not. et Exts. xiv. 429.

1503. "But Dom Vasco . . . said that things must go on as they were to India, and there he would inquire into the truth. And so arriving in the Gulf (golfão) where the storm befel them, all were separated, and that vessel which steered badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Maldiva, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves. For the island abounded in provisions, and the men indulged to excess in eating cocos, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died."—Correa, i. 347.

c. 1610. "Ce Royaume en leur langage s'appelle Malé-ragué, Royaume de Malé, et des autres peuples de l'Inde il s'appelle Malé-divar, et les peuples diues . . . L'Isle principale, comme j'ay dit, s'appelle Malé, qui donne le nom à tout le reste des autres; car le mot Diues signifie vn nombre de petites isles amassées."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 63, 68. Ed. 1679.

1563. "E. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business in hand,—why is that chain of islands called 'Islands of Maldiva'?"

"O. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands; how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names in foreign tongues? But, nevertheless, I will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldiva, but Nalediva; for nale in Malabar means 'four,' and diva 'island,' so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say 'Four Isles' . . . And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Goa Angediva, because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar means 'Five Isles,' for ange is 'five.' But these derivations rest on common report, I don't retail them to you as demonstrable facts."—Garcia, Colloquios, f. 11.

1572. See quotation from Camoens under Coco-de-Mer.

1683. "Mr. Beard sent up his Couries, which he received from ye Maldivas, to be put off and passed by Mr. Charnock at Cassumbazar."—Hedges, Oct. 2.

Malum, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called málum sahib. The word is Arab. mu'allim, literally 'the Instructor,' and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our 'master' in the navy.

In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nakhuda (see Nacoda) is, rather than Mu'allim, 'the captain;' though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Mu'allim from Nakhoda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1497. "And he sent 20 cruzados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malemos, who were the pilots, for of those coins he would give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct."—Correa, i. 38 (E. T. by Ld. Stanley of Alderley, 88).

On this passage the Translator says: "The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa." It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1541. "Meanwhile he sent three catur (q.v.) to the Port of the Malemos (Porto das Malemos) in order to get some pilot . . . In this port of the Bandel of the Malemos the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again."—Correa, iv. 168.*

* This Port was immediately outside the Straits, as appears from the description of Dom João de Castro (1541):

"Now turning to the 'Gates' of the Strait, which are the chief object of our description, we remark that here the land of Arabia juts out into the sea, forming a prominent Point, and very prolonged. . . . This is the point or promontory which Ptolemy calls Possidium. . . In front of it, a little more than a gunshot off, is an islet 1578. "... among whom (at Melinda) came a Moor, a Guzarate by nation, called Malem Cana, who, as much for the satisfaction he had in conversing with our people, as to please the King, who was inquiring for a pilot to give them, agreed to accompany them."—Barros, I. iv. 6.

c. 1590. "Mu'allim or Captain. He must be acquainted with the depths and shallow places of the Ocean, and must know astronomy. It is he who guides the ship to her destination, and prevents her falling into dangers."—Ain, i. 280.

Mamiran, Mamira, s. A medicine from old times of much repute in the East, especially for eye-diseases, and imported from Himalayan and Trans-Himalayan regions. It is a popular native drug in the Punjab bazars, where it is still known as mamira, also as piliuri. It seems probable that the name is applied to bitter roots of kindred properties but of more than one specific origin. Hanbury and Flückiger describe it as the rhizome of Coptis Teeta, Wallich, tita being the name of the drug in the Mishmi country at the head of the Assam Valley, from which it is imported into Bengal. But Stewart states explicitly that the mamira of the Punjab bazars is now "known to be" mostly, if not entirely, derived from Thalictrum foliosum D.C., a tall plant which is common throughout the temperate Himalaya (5000 to 8000 feet) and on the Kasia Hills, and is exported from Kumaon under the name of Momiri. "The Mamira of the old Arab writers was identified with Χελιδόνιον μέγα, by which, however, Löw (Arum. Pflanzen-namen, p. 220) says they understood curcuma longa." W. R. S. (See Turmeric.)

C. A. D. 600-700. "Μαμिरάς, ολον ρίζιον τι πῶς ἔστιν ἔχον ὤπερ κονδύλους πυκνοῦς, ὅσος οὐλὰς τε καὶ λευκώματα λεπτύνειν πεπιστεύεται, δηλονότι ῥυπτικῆς ὑπάρχον δυνάμεως."—Pavli Aeginetae Medici, Libri vii., Basileae 1538. Lib. vii. cap. iii. sect. 12 (p. 246).

c. 1020. "Mamirem quid est? Est lignum sicut nodi declinans ad nigredinem. . . inundificat albuginem in oculis, et acuit visum: quum ex eo fit collyrium et abstergit humiditatem grossam. . ." etc.—Avicennae Opera, Venet. 1564, p. 345 (lib. ii., tractat. ii.).

called the Itheo dos Roborens; because Robodo in Arabic means a pilot; and the pilots living here go aboard the ships which come from outside, and conduct them," etc.—Rotiro do Mar Roxo, &c., 35.

The Island retains its name, and is mentioned as Pilot Island by Capt. Haines in J. R. Geog. Soc. ix. 126. It lies about 1½ m. due east of Perim.

The glossary of Arabic terms by Andreas de Alpago of Belluno, attached to various early editions of Avicenna, gives the following interpretation: "Mamiran est radix nodosa, non multum grossa, citrini coloris, sicut curcuma; minor tamen est et subtilior, et asportatur ex India, et apud physicos orientales est valde nota, et usitatur in passionibus oculi."

c. 1100. "Memiram Arabibus, χελιδόνιον μέγα Graecis," etc.—Io. Serapionis de Simplic. Medicam. Historia, Lib. iv. cap. lxxvi. (ed. Ven. 1552, f. 106).

c. 1200. "Some maintain that this plant (urük al-sibaghin) is the small kurkum (turmeric, q.v.), and others that it is mamirān. . . The kurkum is brought to us from India. . . The mamirān is imported from China, and has the same properties as kurkum."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 186-188.

c. 1550. "But they have a much greater appreciation of another little root which grows in the mountains of Succuir (i.e. Suchau in Shensi), where the rhubarb grows, and which they call Mambromi-Chini (i.e. Mamirān-i-Chini). This is extremely dear, and is used in most of their ailments, but especially when the eyes are affected. They grind it on a stone with rose water, and anoint the eyes with it. The result is wonderfully beneficial."—Hajji Mahomed's Account of Cathay, in Ramusio, ii. f. 15v.

Mamool, s.; Mamoollee, adj. Custom, Customary. Arab. Hind. ma'mūl. The literal meaning is 'practised,' and then 'established, customary.' Ma'mūl is, in short, 'precedent,' by which all Orientals set as much store as English lawyers, e.g. "And Laban said, It must not so be done in our country (lit. It is not so done in our place) to give the younger before the firstborn."—Genesis xxix. 26.

Mamooty, Mamoty, s. A digging tool of the form usual all over India, i.e. not in the shape of a spade, but in that of a hoe, with the helve at an acute angle with the blade. The word is of S. Indian origin, Tamil man-vètti, i.e. 'earth-cutter'; and its vernacular use is confined to the Tamil regions, but it has long been an established term in the list of ordnance stores all over India, and thus has a certain prevalence in Anglo-Indian use beyond those limits.

Manchua, s. A large cargo-boat, with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast. This is the Portuguese form; the original Malayalam word is manji, and nowadays a nearer approach to this, manjee, &c., is usual.

c. 1512. "So he made ready two manchuas, and one night got into the house of the King, and stole from him the most beautiful woman that he had, and, along with her, jewels and a quantity of money."—Correia, i. 281.

Mandadore, s. Port. mandador, one who commands.

1673. "Each of which Tribes have a Mandadore or Superintendent."—Fryer, 7.

Mandalay, Mandalé, n.p. The capital of the King of Burma, founded in 1860, 7 miles north of the preceding capital Amarapura, and between 2 and 3 miles from the left bank of the Irawadi. The name was taken from that of a conical isolated hill, rising high above the alluvial plain of the Irawadi, and crowned by a gilt pagoda. The name of the hill (and now of the city at its base) probably represents Mandara, the sacred mountain which in Hindu mythology served the gods as a churning-staff at the churning of the sea. The hill appears as Mandiye-tawng in Major Grant Allan's Map of the Environs of Amarapura (1855), published in the Narrative of Major Phayre's Mission, but the name does not occur in the Narrative itself.

1861. "Next morning the son of my friendly host accompanied me to the Mandalay Hill, on which there stands in a gilt chapel the image of Shwesayatta, pointing down with outstretched finger to the Palace of Mandalay, interpreted as the divine command there to build a city . . . on the other side where the hill falls in an abrupt precipice, sits a gigantic Buddha gazing in motionless meditation on the mountains opposite. There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and white-washed, which are inhabited by eremites. . . ."—Bastian's Travels (German), ii. 89-90.

Mandarin, s. Portuguese Mandarij, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus:

"A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c." So also T. Hyde in the quotation below.

Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandarij be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivative from 'order,' and called them orderumbos.

The word is really a slight corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a Minister of State,' for which it was indeed the proper old pre-Mahomedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawford's Malay Dict. sub voce). Yet Crawford himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 189). It is, no doubt, probable that the "instinctive striving after meaning" may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsden is still more oddly perverse, videns meliora, deteriora secutus, when he says: "The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese" (H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.* The true etymon is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries but in Continental India.

We may add that mantri is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kasias, q.v.) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarin; see below.

Mandarin Language, s. The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kuan-Hua. It is substantially the language of the people of the northern and middle zones of China, extending to Yun-nan. It is not to be confounded with the literary style which is used in books.

1674. "The Language . . . . is called Quenhra (hua), or the Language of Mandarines, because as they spread their command they introduced it, and it is used throughout all the Empire, as Latin in Europe. It is very barren, and as it has more Letters far than any other, so it has fewer words."—Faria y Sousa, E. T. ii. 468.

Mangalore, n.p. The only place now well known by this name is (a) Mangal-ūr, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 51' N. In Mir Husain Ali's Life of Haidar it is called "Gorial Bunder," perhaps a corr. of Kandiāl, which is said in Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name.

The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology.

But the name in approximate forms (from maṅgala, 'gladness,') is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat was formerly well-known, now commonly called Mungrole. And another place of the name (c) Munglavar in the valley of Swat, north of Peshāwar, is mentioned by Hwen T'sang as a city of Gandhāra. It is probably the same that appears in Sanskrit literature (see Williams, s. v. Mangala) as the capital of Udyāna.

Mangelin, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones.

The word is Tamil. manjādi; Telugu, manjāli.

1516. Diamonds "... sell by a weight which is called a Mangiar, which is equal to 2 tare and  $\frac{3}{4}$ ; and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 321v.

1554. (In Ceylon.) "A calamja contains 20 mangelins, each mangelim 8 grains of rice; a Portuguese of gold weighs 8 calamjas and 2 mangelins."—A. Nunez, 35.

At the Mine of Soumelpore in Bengal they weigh by Rati's, and the Rati is  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a Carat, or  $\frac{3}{4}$  grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Visapour, they make use of Mangelins, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and  $\frac{1}{2}$ . The Portugals in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above  $\frac{1}{2}$  grains."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 141.

Mango, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil mān-kāy, i.e. mān fruit, (the tree being māmarum, 'mān-tree'). The Portuguese formed from this mango, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is uneatable.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (Herb. Amboyn. i. 95) traces it then recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malacca) "mangka, vel vulgo Manga et Mumpelaam." The last word is only the Tamil Māmpalam, i.e. 'mān fruit' again. The close approximation of the Malay mangka to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malacca. But we see manga already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar.

The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayan colonist, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape mangka. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are īm and īmba, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkani, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1328) calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de' Marignolli calls the tree "amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach." (Cathay, &c. ii. 362). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree.

The Skt. name is āmra, and this we find in Hwen T'sang (c. 645) phoneticised as 'An-mo-lo.'

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dysentery in the army of Alexander. (See the passage s.v. Jack.)

c. 1328. "Est etiam alia arbor quae fructus facit ad modum pruni, grossissimos, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt fructus ita dulces et amabiles, quod ore tenuis exprimi hoc minimè possit."—Fr. Jordanus, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 42.

c. 1334. "The mango-tree ('anba) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unwholesome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever."—Tun Batuta, iii. 125. At ii. 185 he writes 'anbi.'

c. 1349. "They have also another tree called Amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 362.

1510. "Another fruit is also found here, which is called Anba, the stem of which is called Manga," &c.—Varthema, 160-161.

1563. "O. Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the veranda here—and they seem but small ones.

"Servant. I will bring you word presently.

"G. Sir! it is Simon Toscano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of mangas for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has moored the boat he will come here to stop.

"O. He couldn't have come more a propos. I have a manga-tree (manguira) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency. Boy! take out six mangas."—Garcia, ff. 134 r., 135.

This author also mentions that the mangas of Ormuz were the most celebrated; also certain mangas of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Balaghat were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arratel and a half (4½ lbs.); and those of Bengal, Pegu, and Malacca were also good.

c. 1590. "The Mangoe (Anba) . . . . This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmands of Túrán and Irán place it above muskmelons and grapes. . . . If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months."—Ain, i. 67-68.

1615. "There is another very liquorish fruit called Amangues growing on trees, and it is as bigge as a great quince, with a very great stone in it."—De Monfart, 20.

1622. P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Miná (Minao) near Hormuz, under the name of Amba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as "manga or amba."—ii. pp. 313-14, and 581.

1631. "Alibi vero commemorat mangae speciem fortis admodum odoris, Terebinthinam scilicet, et Piceae arboris lacrymam redolentes, quas propterea nostri stinkers appellat."—Piso on Bontis, Hist. Nat. p. 95.

1673. Of the Goa mango,* Fryer says justly: "When ripe, the Apples of the Hesperides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Nectarine, Peach, and Apricot fall short. . . ." p. 182.

1679. "Mango and saio (see soy), two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Locke's Journal in Ld. King's Life, 1830, i. 249.

Also Hamilton :

1727. "The Goa mango is reckoned the largest and most delicious to the taste of any in the world, and I may add, the wholesomest and best tasted of any Fruit in the World."—A. Ham. i. 235.

1883. ". . . . the unsophisticated ryot . . . conceives that cultivation could only emasculate the pronounced flavour and firm fibrous texture of that prince of fruits, the wild mango, likest a ball of tow soaked in turpentine."—Tribes on My Frontier, 149.

The name has been carried with the fruit to Mauritius and the West Indies.

Among many greater services to India the late Sir Proby Cautley diffused largely in Upper India the delicious fruit of the Bombay mango, previously rare there, by creating and encouraging groves of grafts on the banks of the Jumna and Ganges canals. It is especially true of this fruit (as Sultan Baber indicates) that excellence depends on the variety. The common mango is coarse and strong of turpentine. Of this only an evanescent suggestion remains to give peculiarity in the finer varieties.

Mango-bird s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its "loud mellow whistle" from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1878. "The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle melody."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 59.

Mango-fish, s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polynemus Visui of Buchanan, P. paradiseus of Day), in flavour somewhat resembling the smelt, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the mullets. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindustani name is taprī or tapassi, 'an ascetic,' or penitent, but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or free rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave.

1781. "The BOARD OF TRUSTIES Assembled on Tuesday at the New Tavern, where the Committee meet to eat Mangoe Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, March 3.

Mango-showers, s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangoes begin to ripen.

Mango-trick. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahāngir in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangoes is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jesuits. Annaes Marthimos, ii. 270. In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahomedan names. The author of Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 148, mentions the luscious prairie and the delicate afpos as two fine varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Peres and a certain Affonso.

c. 1610. “. . . Khaun-e-Jehaun, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry tree. The men arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves . . . when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proved the tree required by Khaun-e-Jehaun. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fig-tree, an almond, a walnut . . . open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits. . . . Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood . . . in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind . . . the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, however, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage birds of such surpassing beauty, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. . . . At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth. . . .”—Memo. of the Emp. Jahanguir, tr. by Major D. Price, pp. 96-97.

c. 1650. “Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and ask'd the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Menques; then one of the Mountebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stooped to the ground five or six times one after another. I was so curious to go upstairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Mountebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the armpits with a Razor, he rubb'd the stick with his Blood. After the two first times that he rais'd himself, the stick seem'd to the very eye to grow. The third time there sprung out branches with young buds. The fourth time the tree was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. . . . The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that those Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-an-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bare leaves and flowers as in the Spring-time: he went about to break it, protesting he would not give the Communion to any person that should stay any longer to see those things.”—Tacerner, Travels made English by J. P., ii. 36.

1667. “When two of these Jouguis (see Jogi) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them up on the point and power of their knowledge or Janguisme, you shall see them do such tricks out of spite to one another, that I know not if Simon Magus could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree blossom and bear fruit in less than an hour, hatch eggs in their bosome in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand. . . . I mean, if what is said of them, is true. . . . For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity none of those happy Men, that are present at, and see these great feats.”—Bernier, E. T., 103.

1673. “Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less.”—Fryer, 192.

1690. “Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had pluckt one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and was never well as long as he kept it, 'till he consulted a Bramin for his Health, who prescrib'd his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restor'd to his Health again.”—Orington, 258-9.

1726. “They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit: after they have got their answer the jugglers (Koorde-dansers) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (&c., &c.).

There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

“These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the armpits, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground they wetted it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and to come to the perfection before described.

“This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can't move me to believe it!”—Valentin, v. (Chorom.) 53.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer's, and the hugger-mugger performance that he testifies. But many others have testified to more marvellous skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjuror, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mangoplant. But lo ! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever ! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

1657. “. . . . . trium horarum spatio arbusculam veram spitamæ longitudine e mensâ facere enasci, ut et alias arbores frondiferas et fructiferas.”—Magia Universalis, of P. Gaspar Schottus e Soc. Jes., Heriboli, 1657, i. 32.

Mangosteen, s. From Malay mang-gusta (Crawfurd), or manggistan (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garcinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Guttiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1563. “R. They have bragged much to me of a fruit which they call mangostans; let us hear what you have to say of these.

“O. What I have heard of the mangostan is that 'tis one of the most delicious fruits that they have in those regions . . .” —Garcia, f. 151v.

1598. “There are yet other fruites, as . . . . . Mangostaine . . . but because they are of small account I thinke it not requisite to write severallie of them.”—Linschoten, 96.

“Cedant Hesperii longe hinc, mala aurea, fructus, Ambrosia pascit Mangostan et nectare divos—

. . . Inter omnes Indiae fructus longe sapidissimus.”

Jac. Bontii. lib. vi., cap. 28, p. 115.

1645. “Il s'y trouue de plus vne espece de fruit propre du terroir de Malague, qu'ils nomment Mangostans.”—Curdin, Rel. de la Prov. de Japon, 162.

1727. “The Mangostane is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, the Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astringent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlick, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold.”—A. Ham. ii. 80.

Mangrove, s. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For whilst the former genus is, according to Crawfurd, called by the Malays manggi-manggi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French manglier, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New.

Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that “maize, mangle, hammock, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahiz, mangle, hamaca, canoa, and tabaco.”

It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question.

The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1535. “Of the Tree called Mangle . . . These trees grow in places of mire, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see . . . they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots . . . and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other.”—Oviedo, in Ramusio, iii. f. 145 v.

“So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoa with some 30 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-water, and which they call mangle.”—Ibid. f. 224.

1553. “. . . by advice of a Moorish pilot, who promised to take the people by night to a place where water could be got . . . and either because the Moor desired to land many times on the shore by which he was conducting them, seeking to get away from the hands of those whom he was conducting, or because he was really perplexed by its being night, and in the middle of a great growth of mangrove (mangues) he never succeeded in finding the wells of which he spoke."—Barros, I. iv. 4.

c. 1830. "Smite my timbers, do the trees bear shellfish?" The tide in the Gulf of Mexico does not ebb and flow above two feet except in the springs, and the ends of the drooping branches of the mangrove trees, that here cover the shore, are clustered, within the wash of the water, with a small well-favoured oyster."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, 119.

Manilla-man, s. This term is applied to natives of the Philippines, who are often employed on shipboard, and especially furnish the seacunnies (q.v.) or quarter-masters in Lascar crews on the China voyage. But Manilla-man seems also, from Wilson, to be used in S. India as a hybrid from Telug. manelā vādu, 'an itinerant dealer in coral and gems;' perhaps in this use, as he says, from Skt. maṇi, a 'jewel, but with some blending also of the Port. manilha, 'a bracelet;' compare Cobra-manilla.

Manjee, s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft. Hind. mānjhi, Beng. mājī and mājhi. The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Pahāris or Hill-people of Rājmañh (Wilson).

1781. "This is to give notice that the principal Gaut Mangies of Calcutta have entered into engagements at the Police office to supply all Persons that apply there with Boats and Budgerows, and to give security for the Dandies."—India Gazette, Feb. 17.

1784. "Mr. Austin and his head bearer, who were both in the room of the budgerow, are the only persons known to be drowned. The manjees and dandees have not appeared."—In Seton-Karr, i. 25.

1810. "Their manjies will not fail to take every advantage of whatever distress, or difficulty, the passenger may labour under."—Williamson, V.M., i. 148.

Mannickjore, s. H. mānik-jor; the white-necked stork (Ciconia leucocephala, Gmelin); sometimes, according to Jerdon, called in Bengal the 'Beef-steak bird,' because palatable when cooked in that fashion. "The name Manikjor means the companion of Munik, a Saint, and some Mussulmans in consequence abstain from eating it" (Jerdon).

Manucodiata. See Bird of Paradise.

Maramut, Murrumut, s. Hind. from Arab. maramma(t), 'repair.' In this sense the use is general in Hindustani (in which the terminal t is always pronounced, though not by the Arabs) whether as applied to a stocking, a fortress, or a ship. But in Madras Presidency the word had formerly a very specialised sense as the recognised title of that branch of the executive which included the conservation of irrigation tanks and the like, and which was worked under the District Civil Officers, there being then no separate department of the State in charge of Civil Public Works.

It is a curious illustration of the wide spread at one time of Musulman power that the same Arabic word, in the form Marama, is still applied in Sicily to a standing committee charged with repairs of the Duomo or Cathedral of Palermo. An analogous instance of the wide grasp of the Saracenic power is mentioned by one of the Musulman authors whom Amari quotes in his History of the Mahomedan rule in Sicily. It is that the Caliph Al-Māmūn, under whom conquest was advancing in India and in Sicily simultaneously, ordered that the idols taken from the infidels in India should be sent for sale to the infidels in Sicily!

Margosa, s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon, for the Nim tree (see Neem). The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, 'bitter,' indicating the characteristic of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the jātakas, that you cannot sweeten the nīm tree, though you water it with syrup and ghee (Naturam expellas furcā, etc.).

1727. "The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crows come and eat the fruit of the margoise tree as soon as it is ripe."—Apophthegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 390.

1782. "... ils lavent le malade avec de l'eau froide, ensuite ils le frottent rudement avec de la feuille de Margosier."—Sonnerat, i. 208.

1834. "Adjacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margosa trees."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

Markhore, s. P. mār-khōr, 'snake-eater.' A fine wild goat of the Western Himalaya; Cupra najaerops, Hutton.

Martaban, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talaing, Müt-ta-man, the meaning of which we have been unable to ascertain.

1514. "... passed then before Martaman, the people also heathens; men expert in everything, and first-rate merchants; great masters of accounts, and in fact the greatest in the world. They keep their accounts in books like us. In the said country is great produce of lac, cloths, and provisions."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, p. 80.

1545. "At the end of these two days the King . . . caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martabano was delivered to the mercy of the Souldiers . . . and therein shewed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown."—Pinto (in Cogan), 203.

1553. "And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast of that country, are Vagara, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Rey, Talaga, and Tavay."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1586. "The city of Martaban hath its front to the south-east, south, and south-west, and stands on a river which there enters the sea . . . it is a city of Mauparagia, a Prince of the King of Pegu's."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 129v.-130v.

Martaban, s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telugu.

c. 1350. "Then the Princess made me a present, consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four rots of cordial syrup, and four Martabāns, or huge jars, filled with

"In this towne many of the great earthen pots are made, which in India are called Martauanas, and many of them carried throughout all India of all sortes both small and great; some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. Martil, Martol, s. A hammer. Hind. martól, from Portuguese martello, but assisted by imaginary connection with H. mār-nā, 'to strike.'

Martingale, s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martingale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, Littré gives chausses à la martingale as meaning "culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière," and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Ménage, is from Martiques in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skeat seems to accept these explanations. But there is a Spanish word, al-martaga, for a kind of bridle, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab. rataka, "qui, à la IVe forme, signifie 'effecit ut brevibus passibus incederet.'" This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabic direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Spanish word from al-mirta'a, 'a halter.'

Maryacar, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so styled. Marya Karar, or "Mary's People."

Mascabar, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for 'the last day of the month,' quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 345. He suggests as its etymon Hind. mās-ka-ba'd, 'after a month.'

Mash, s. Hind. māsh; Phaseolus radiatus, Roxb. One of the common Hindu pulses.

Maskee. This is a term in Chinese "pigeon," meaning 'never mind,' 'n'importe,' which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or ellipsis of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested.

Masulipatam, n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machlipatan or Machlibandar; and its name explained (H. machhli = fish) as Fish-town. The etymology may originally have such a connexion, but there can be little doubt that the name is a trace of the Μαυσολία and Μαυσώλου ποταμού ἐκβολαί which we find in Ptolemy's Tables; and of the Μασαλία producing muslins in the Periplus.

1619. "Master Methwold came from Missulapatom in one of the Country Boats."—Pring in Purchas, i. 638.

c. 1681. "The road between had been covered with brocade velvet, and Machlibender chintz."—Seir Mutagherin, iii. 370.

1789. "Masulipatam, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machlipatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago."—Note on Seir Mutagherin, iii. 370.

c. 1790. "... cloths of great value . . . from the countries of Bengal, Bunnarus, China, Kashmeer, Boorhanpoor, Mutchliputtan, &c."—Meer Hussein Ali, H. of Hydr Na'ik, 383.

Mate, Maty, s. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense, or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a 'head-man,' the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see Bearer); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (qq.v.), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c., to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives meṭṭi as a distinct Malayālam word for an inferior domestic servant. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Āin, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar's establishment are styled respectively Mahāwat, Bhoi, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as meṭha, meṇṭha, and meṇḍa, 'an elephant-keeper or feeder.' But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mītra, 'associate, friend'? We have in Pali metta, 'friendship,' from Skt. maitra.

c. 1590. "Amet'h fetches fodder and assistants in caparisoning the elephant. Met'hs of all classes get on the march 4 dāms daily, and at other times 3½."—Āin, i. 125.

1810. "In some families mates or assistants are allowed, who do the drudgery."—Williamson, V. M. i. 241.

1837. "One matee."—See Letters from Madras, 106.

1872. "At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them."—A True Reformer, ch. vi.

1873. "To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper" (of an elephant).—Saturday Review, Sept. 6, 302.

Matranee, s. Properly Hind. from Pers. mihtarāni; a female sweeper. See Mehtar.

Matross, s. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ. matrosse, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it.

In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matrosses, and 2 Drummers." A definition of the Matross is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

1673. "There being in pay for the Honourable East India Company of English and Portuguese, 700, reckoning the Montrosses and Gunners."—Fryer, 38.

1757. "I have with me one Gunner, one Matross, and two Lascars."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rept. i. 203.

1779. "Matrosses are properly apprentices to the gunner, being soldiers in the royal regiment of artillery, and next to them; they assist in loading, firing, and spunging the great guns. They carry firelocks, and march along with the guns and store-waggons, both as a guard, and to give their assistance in every emergency."—Capt. G. Smith's Universal Military Dictionary.

1792. "Wednesday evening, the 25th inst., a Matross of Artillery deserted from the Mount, and took away with him his firelock, and nine rounds of powder and ball."—Madras Courier, Feb. 2.

Matt, s. Touch (of gold). Tamil mārru (pron. māṭṭu), perhaps from Skt. mātra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be of 9 mārru, inferior gold of 5 or 6 mārru.

1693. "Gold, purified from all other metals . . . by us is reckoned as of four-and-twenty Carats, but by the blacks is here divided and reckoned as of ten mat."—Havart, 106.

1727. At Mocha . . . "the Coffee Trade brings in a continual Supply of Silver and Gold . . . from Turkey, Ebramies and Mograbis, Gold of low Matt."—A. Ham. i. 43.

1752. "... to find the Value of the Touch in Fanams, multiply the Matt by 10, and then by 8, which gives it in Fanams."—T. Brooks, 25.

Maumlet, s. Domestic Hind. mām-lat, for 'omelet.'

Maund, s. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. man, Mahr. man), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. The word is indeed one of the most ancient on our list. Professor Sayce traces it (mana) back to the Accadian language.\* But in any case it was the Babylonian name for  $\frac{1}{60}$  of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or mna of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the emna or amna of the Copts, the Hebrew māneh, the Greek μῶν, and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country in the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almena, and in old French almène for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devic).

The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted man into mão, of which the English made maune, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund†) our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese mão, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as a weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 *ser*s, each ser being divided into 16 chhiṭāks; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the ser varies. That of the standard ser is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82 $\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. avoirdupois. The Bombay maund (or man) of 40 *ser*s = 28 lbs.; the Madras one of 40 *ser*s = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Almadnagar contained 64 *ser*s, and was = 163 $\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. This is the largest man we find in the 'Useful Tables.' The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and = 18 lbs. 12 oz. 13 dr. The Persian Tabrizi man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shāhī twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$  dr.

b.c. 692. In the "Eponymy of Zazai," a house in Nineveh, with its shrubbery and gates, is sold for one maneh of silver according to the royal standard. Quoted by Sayce, u. s.

b.c. 667. We find Nergal-sarra-nacir lending "four manehs of silver, according to the maneh of Carchemish."—Ibid.

c. b.c. 524. "Cambyses received the Lybian presents very graciously, but not so the gifts of the Cyrenaeans. They had sent no more than 500 minae of silver, which Cambyses, I imagine, thought too little. He therefore snatched the money from them, and with his own hand scattered it among the soldiers."—Herodot. iii. ch. 13 (E. T. by Ravelinson).

c. A.D. 70. "Et quoniam in mensuris quoque ac ponderibus crebro Græcis nominibus utendum est, interpretationem eorum semel in hoc loco ponemus: . . . mna, quam nostri minam vocant, pendet drachmas Atticas c."—Pliny, xxi, at end.

c. 1020. "The gold and silver ingots amounted to 700,400 mans in weight."—Al'Utbi in Elliot, ii. 35.

1040. "The Amir said:—'Let us keep fair measure, and fill the cups evenly.' . . . Each Goblet contained half a man."—Baihaki in Elliot, ii. 144.

1563. "The value of stones is only because people desire to have them, and because they are scarce, but as for virtues, those of the loadstone, which staunches blood, are very much greater and better attested than those of the emerald. And yet the former sells by maos, which are in Cambay . . . equal to 26 arratels each, and the latter by ratis, which weigh 3 grains of wheat."—Garcia, f. 159r.

† "Maund, a kind of great Basket or Hamper, containing eight Bales, or two Fats. It is commonly a quantity of 8 bales of unbound Books, each Bale having 1000 lbs. weight."—Giles Jacob, New Law Dict., 7th ed., 1756, s.v.

1598. "They have another weight called Mao, which is a Hand, and is 12 pounds."—Linschoten, 69.

1610. "He was found . . . to have sixtie maunes in Gold, and every Maune is five and fiftie pound weight."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 218.

1611. "Each maund being three and thirtie pound English weight."—Middleton, in Purchas, i. 270.

c. 1665. "Le man pese quarante livres par toutes les Indes, mais ces livres ou serres sont diferentes selon les Pais."—Theriot, v. 54.

1673. "A Lumbrico (Sconce) of pure Gold, weighing about one Maund and a quarter, which is Forty-two pounds."—Fryer, 78.

"The Surat Maund . . . is 40 Sear, of 20 Pice the Sear, which is 37l.

The Pucka Maund at Agra is double as much, where is also the Ecbarry Maund which is 40 Sear, of 30 Pice to the Sear. . . "

Ibid. 205.

1683. "Agreed with Chittur Mullsaw and Muttradas, Merchants of this place (Hugly), for 1,500 Bales of ye best Tissinda Sugar, each bale to weigh 2 Maunds, 6½ Seers, Factory weight."—Hedges, April 5.

1711. "Sugar, Coffee, Tutanague, all sorts of Drugs, &c., are sold by the Maund Tabrees; which in the Factory and Custom house is nearest 63l. Avoirdupois. . . &c. are sold by the Maund Copara of 73l. . . The Maund Shaw is two Maunds Tabrees, used at Ispahan."—Lockyer, 230.

c. 1760. Grose says, "the maund they weigh their indicos with is only 53 lb." He states the maund of Upper India as 69 lb.; at Bombay, 28 lb.; at Goa, 14 lb.; at Surat, 37½ lb.; at Coromandel, 25 lb.; in Bengal, 75 lb.

1854. ". . . You only consent to make play when you have packed a good maund of traps on your back."—Life of Lord Lawrence, i. 433.

Mazagong, n.p. A suburb of Bombay, containing a large Portuguese population.

"Mazaguão, por 15,000 fedeads,
Montbaym, por 15,000."

S. Botelho, Tombo, 149.

1644. "Going up the stream from this town (Mombaym, i.e. Bombay) some 2 leagues, you come to the aldea of Mazagam."—Bocarro, MS. f. 227.

1673. ". . . for some miles together, till the Sea break in between them; over against which lies Massegoung, a great Fishing Town. . . The Ground between this and the Great Breach is well ploughed and bears good Battys. Here the Portugals have another Church and Religious House belonging to the Franciscans."—Fryer, p. 67.

Meeana, Myanna, s. Hind. mīāna. The name of a kind of palankin; that kind out of which the palankin used by Europeans has been developed, and which has been generally adopted in India for the last century. In Williamson's Vade Mecum (i. 319) the word is written Mohannah (see s.v. Myanna).

1793. "To be sold . . . an Elegant New Bengal Meana, with Hair Bedding and furniture."—Bombay Courier, Nov. 2d.

1795. "For Sale, an Elegant Fashionable New Meanna from Calcutta."—Id., May 16th.

Meerass, s., Meerassy, adj., Mee-rassidar, s. 'Inheritance,' 'hereditary,' 'a holder of hereditary property,' Hind. from Arab. mīrās, mīrāṣi, mī-rāṣdār; and these from warīṣ, 'to inherit.'

1806. "Every meerassdar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah (q.v.) for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812. "The term meerasssee . . . was introduced by the Mahommedans."—Ibid. 136.

1877. "All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years' absence."—Meadows Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

"I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasdars,—that is, persons who hold their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.

Mehaul, s. Hind. from Arab. maḥall, being properly the pl. of Arab. maḥall. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Wilson may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of maḥall (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, maḥāl), is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. maḥall (also written in the vernaculars maḥal, and maḥāl) is often used for a palace or important edifice, e.g. see Sheeshmahal, Tajmahal.

Mehtar, s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengal Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mihtar (= Lat. major), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consolation, as the domestic tailor is styled Khalifa. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. See also Matrahee. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars hailing each other as Mahārāj!

In Persia the menial application of the word seems to be different (see below).

The same class of servant is usually in W. India called bhangī (v. bungy); and in Madras toṭṭi.

1810. "The mater, or sweeper, is considered the lowest menial in every family."—Williamson, V. M., i. 276-7. See also verses quoted under bunow.

1828. "... besides many mehtars or stable-boys."—Hajji Baba in England, i. 60.

Melinde, Melinda, n.p. The name (Malinda or Mulindi) of an Arab town and state on the east coast of Africa, in S. lat. 3° 9'; the only one at which the expedition of Vasco da Gama had amicable relations with the people, and that at which they obtained the pilot who guided the squadron to the coast of India.

c. 1150. "Melinde, a town of Zendj . . . is situated on the sea-shore at the mouth of a river of fresh water . . . It is a large town, the people of which . . . draw from the sea different kinds of fish, which they dry, and trade in. They also possess and work mines of iron."—Eltrisi (Jaubert), i. 56.

c. 1320. See also Abulfeda, by Reinaud, ii. 207.

1498. "And that same day at sundown we cast anchor right opposite a place which is called Milinde, which is 30 leagues from Mombaca. . . . On Easter Day those Moors whom we held prisoners, told us that in the said town of Milinde were stopping four ships of Christians who were Indians, and that if we desired to take them these would give us, instead of themselves, Christian Pilots."—Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, 42-43.

1554. "As the King of Melinde pays no tribute, nor is there any reason why he should, considering the many tokens of friendship we have received from him, both on the first discovery of these countries, and to this day, and which in my opinion we repay very badly, by the ill treatment which he has from the Captains who go on service to this Coast."—Sinão Botelho, Tomba, 17.

c. 1570. "Di Chiau si negotia anco per la costa de' Melindi in Ethiopia."—Cesare de Federici in Ram., iii. 390c.

"Quando chegava a frota áquella parte Onde o reino Melinde já se via,
De toldos adornada, e leda de arte :
Que bem mostra estimar a sancta dia :
Treme a bandeira, voa o estandarte,
A cor purpurea ao longe apparecia,
Soam os atambores, e pandeiros :
E assi entravam ledos e guerreiros."

Camões, ii. 73.

By Burton :

"At such a time the Squadron neared the part where first Melinde's goodly shore unseen, in awnings drest and pranked with gallant art, to show that none the Holy Day misween : Flutter the flags, the streaming Estandart gleams from afar with gorgeous, purple sheen, tom-toms and timbrels mingle martial jar : thus past they forwards with the pomp of war."

1610. P. Teixeira tells us that among the "Moors" at Ormuz, Albuquerque was known only by the name of Malandy, and that with some difficulty he obtained the explanation that he was so called because he came thither from the direction of Melinde, which they call Maland.—Relacion de los Reyes de Harmuz, 45.

1859. "As regards the immigration of the Wagemu (Ajemi, or Persians), from whom the ruling tribe of the Wasawahili derives its name, they relate that several Shaykhs, or elders, from Shiraz emigrated to Shangaya, a district near the Ozi River, and founded the town of Malindi (Melinda)."—Burton, in J. R. G. S. xxix. 51.

Mem-Sahib, s. This singular example of a hybrid term is the usual respectful designation of a European married lady in the Bengal Presidency; the first portion representing mām. Madam Sahib is used at Bombay. See Dorisani.

Mendy, s. Hind. mehndī; the plant Lawsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is this plant whose leaves afford the henna, used so much in Mahomedan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehndī is, according to Royle, the Cyperus of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the camphire of Canticles i. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cypress for cyperus.

c. 1817. "... his house and garden might be known from a thousand others by their extraordinary neatness. His garden was full of trees, and was well fenced round with a ditch and mindey hedge."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. of 1873, p. 71.

Mercall, Marcal, s. Tam. marakkāl, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was = 12 sers of grain. Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and =  $\frac{1}{100}$  of a garce (q.v.).

1554. (Negapatam) "Of ghee (manteiga) and oil, one mercar is =  $2\frac{1}{2}$  canadas."—A. Nunes, 36.

1803. "... take care to put on each bullock full six mercalls or 72 seers."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837) ii. 85.

Mergui, n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of British Burma with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824–26. The name is probably of Siamese origin: the town is called by the Burmese Beit (Sir A. Phayre).

1568. "Tenasari la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Sion, posta infra terra due o tre marce sopra vn gran fiume . . . ed oue il fiume entra in mare e vna villa chiamata Mergi, nel porto della quale ogn' anno si caricano alcune navi di verano (see brazil-wood and sappan-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di belzuin (see benjamin), e qualche poco di garofalo, macis, noci. . . ."—Ces. Federici in Ramus, iii. 327 r.

Milk-bush, Milk-hedge, s. Euphorbia Tirucalli, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.

1780. "Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used. . . . when squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . . A horse will have his head and eyes prodigiously swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."—Munro's Narr. 80.

Minicoy, n.p. Minikai. An island intermediate between the Maldive and Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Maldivian. The population in 1871 was 2800. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse is now (1883) being erected on the island. This is probably the island intended by Mulkee in that ill-edited book the E. T. of Tuhfat al-Mujahidin.

Misree, s. Sugar candy. Misirī, 'Egyptian,' from Misir, Egypt, showing the original source of supply. See under Sugar.

1810. "The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of miscery, bears a price suited to its quality. . . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 134.

Missal, s. Hind.; from Arab. misāl, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court.

Mobed, s. Pers. mābid, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlevi magô-pat = 'Lord Magus.'

Mocuddum, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddam, 'præpositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realization of the revenue (v. lumberdar); to the local head of a caste (v. chowdry); to the headman of a body of peons, or of a gang of labourers (v. Mate), &c., &c. (See further detail in Wilson.) Cobarruvias (Tesoro de la Lengua Castellana, 1611) gives Almocaden, "Capitan de Infanteria."

c. 1347. "... The princess invited . . . the tandail or mukaddam of the crew, and the sipāhsālār or mukaddam of the archers."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.*

"The Jaylor, which in their language is called Mocadan, repairing in the morning to us, and finding our two companions dead, goes away in all haste therewith to acquaint the Guazil, which is as the Judg with us."—Cogan's Transl., p. 8.

This passage is also referred to under Nacoda. The French translation runs as follows:—"Cette princesse invita . . . le trahit ou 'général des piétons,' et le sipāhsālār ou 'général des archers.'" In answer to a query, our friend, Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "The word is rājā, and this may be used either as the plural of rājā, 'man,' or as the pl. of rājā, 'piéton.' But foreman, or 'præpositus' of the 'men' (mukaddam) is not well rendered 'général,' is just as possible." And, if as possible, much more reasonable! Dulaurier (J. ds. ser. iv. tom. ix.) renders rājā here "sailors." See also article Tindal; and see the quotation under the present article from Docruo MS.

Moccudduma, s. Hind. from Arab. mukaddama, a piece of business: but especially a suit at law.

Modelliar, Modliar, s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly it would appear on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste-title, assumed by certain Tamil people who style themselves Sudras (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. mudaliyār; an honorific plural from mudali, 'a chief.'

c. 1350. "When I was staying at Columbum (Quilon) with those Christian chiefs who are called Modilial, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me..."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., ii. 381.

1522. "And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made, in which they found part of the bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tani (Tami) mudolyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.'"—Correa, ii. 726.

1810. "We... arrived at Barbareen about two o'clock, where we found that the provident Modelliar had erected a beautiful rest-house for us, and prepared an excellent collation."—Maria Graham, 98.

Mofussil, s., also used adjactively, "The provinces,"—the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from the 'Presidency,' or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contradistinguished from the 'Sudder' or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities.

Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Mofussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Mofussil he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India.

The word (Hind. from Arab.) mufassal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as mufassal adalat, a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of "Too Clever by Half," &c., and endured for many years.

1781. "... a gentleman lately arrived from the Moussel" (plainly a misprint).—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, March 31.

1836. "... the Mofussil newspapers which I have seen, though generally disposed to cavil at all the acts of the Government, have often spoken favourably of the measure."—T. B. Macaulay, Life, &c. i. 399.

Mogul, n.p. This name should properly mean a person of the great nomad race of Mongols, called in Persia, &c., Mughals; but in India it has come, in connexion with the nominally Mongol, though essentially rather Turk, family of Baber, to be applied to all foreign Mahomedans from the countries on the W. and N.W. of India, except the Pathāns. In fact these people themselves make a sharp distinction between the Mughal Irānī, of Pers. origin (who is a Shia), and the M. Tūrānī of Turk origin (who is a Sunni). Beg is the characteristic affix of the Mughal's name, as Khān is of the Pathān's. Among the Mahomedans of S. India the Moguls or Mughals constitute a strongly marked caste.

In Portuguese writers Mogol or Mogor is often used for "Hindustān" or the territory of the Great Mogul—see under next article.

In the quotation from Baber below the name still retains its original application. The passage illustrates the tone in which Baber always speaks of his kindred of the Steppe, much as Lord Clyde used sometimes to speak of "confounded Scotchmen."

Mogul, The Great, n. p. Sometimes 'The Mogul' simply. The name by which the Kings of Dehli of the House of Timur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grão Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy, (q.v.) as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the 'Great Turk' applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one.

As noticed under the preceding article, Mogol, Mogor, and also Mogolistan are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Mughal is thus used in the Araish-i-Mahfil below, and Mogolistan must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. See quotations from Thevenot, here and under Mohwa.

1625. "... let him have his shirt on and his Mogul breeches; here are women in the house."—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July, 1883, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

Mohur, Gold, s. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Pers. muhur, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin. It seems possible that the word is taken from mihir, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circlet on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Vullers).

The term muhur, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahomedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghûri Kings of Ghazni and their freedmen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratis of pure gold (v. ruttee), or about 175 grains, thus equalling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called rupee.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.* But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably; a deviation which seems to have commenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (1325—1351) who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the immemorial accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, inasmuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167·22 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1766, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 sicca rupees. The full weight of this coin was 179·66 grs., containing 149·72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 sicca rupees. The weight of this was 190·773 grs. (according to Regn. of 1793, 190·894), and it contained 190·086 grs. of gold. Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to fine silver, from the present rates of 1 to 14·861 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass current at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204·710 grs. containing fine gold 187·651 grs. Once more Act xvii. of 1835 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with proportionate subdivisions) a gold mohur or "15 rupee piece" of the weight of 180 grs. troy, containing 165 grs. of pure gold; and declared also that no gold coin should thenceforward be a legal tender of payment in any of the territories of the E. I. Company.

There has been since then no substantive change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohr was a corruption of 'gol' (i.e. 'round') mohr, indicating a distinction from the square mohrs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

1690. "The Gold Moor, or Gold Roupie, is valued generally at 14 of Silver; and the Silver Roupie at Two Shillings Three Pence."—Ovington, 219.

1820. "I heard that a private of the Company's Foot Artillery passed the very noses of the prize-agents, with 500 gold mohurs (sterling 1000*l.*) in his hat or cap."—John Shipp, ii. 226.

Mohurrum, s. Ar. Muharram

* Was this ignorance, or slang? Though slave-boys, are occasionally mentioned, there is no indication that slaves were at all the usual substitute for domestic servants at this time in European families.

('sacer'), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahommedan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hasan and of his brother Husain (A.D. 669 and 680), and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashūrā-a, commonly however known in India as "the Mohurrum." For a full account of these ceremonies see Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2d ed. 98-148. And see in this book Hobson-Jobson.

1869. "Fête du Martyre de Huçain . . . On la nomme généralement Muharram du nom du mois . . . et plus spécialement Dahā, mot persan dérivé de dah 'dix', . . . les dénominations viennent de ce que la fête de Huçain dure dix jours."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. p. 31.

Mohwa, Mhowa, Mowa, s. Hind. &c. mahā or mahwā (Skt. madhāka) the large oak-like tree Bassia latifolia,* Roxb. (Nat. Ord. Sapotaceae), also the flower of this tree from which a spirit is distilled, and the spirit itself. It is said that the Mahwā flower is now largely exported to France for the manufacture of liqueurs. The tree, in groups, or singly, is common all over Central India in the lower lands, and, more sparsely, in the Gangetic provinces.

c. 1665. "Les bornes du Mogolistan et de Golconde sont plantées à environ une lieue et demie de Calvar. Ce sont des arbres qu'on appelle Mahoua; ils marquent la dernière terre du Mogol."—Thevenot, v. 200.

1871. "The flower . . . possesses considerable substance, and a sweet but sickly taste and smell. It is a favourite article of food with all the wild tribes, and the lower classes of Hindūs; but its main use is in the distillation of ardent spirits, most of what is consumed being Mhowa. The spirit, when well made, and mellowed by age, is by no means of despicable quality, resembling in some degree Irish whisky. The luscious flowers are no less a favourite food of the brute creation than of man. . . ."—Forsyth, Highlands of C. India, 75.

* Moodeen Sherif (Suppl. to the Pharmacopœia of India) says that the Mohwā in question is Bassia longifolia, and the wild Mahwā Bassia latifolia.

Mole-islam, n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahomedans or quasi-Mahomedans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahmūd Bigarra, Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term.

Moley, s. A kind of (so-called wet) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Malay'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malays.

Molly, or (better) Mallee, s. Hind. mālī, 'a gardener,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of. "the Molly with his dolly," viz., of the mālī with his dālī (see dolly).

1759. In a Calcutta wages tariff of this year we find—

In Long, 182.

Moluccas, n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Tarnāti), Tidore (Tidori), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands now under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Amboyna, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz.: Amboyna, Banda, Ternate, and Manado. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazīrat-al-Mulūk, 'The Isles of the Kings.'

Since the above was written I see that Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Moluccos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject" (Deel, i. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:

"For what reason they have been called Moluccos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukse Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also just seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Geogr. Congress at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seqq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as Molokos, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolano, or King. "Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peu à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l'état même. A la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos." There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer's deductions and etymologies.

c. 1430. "Has (Javas) ultra xv dierum cursu duae reperuntur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellatur, in qua nuces muscatae et maces; altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola garofali producuntur."
—N. Conti in Poggius.

1510. "We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse . . . Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited."—Varthema, 246.

1514. "Further on is Timor, whence comes sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Maluc, whence come the cloves. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers."—Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515. "From Malacca ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nut(meg), sandalwood, and other rich things. They have discovered the five Islands of Cloves; two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the rod. 'Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us . . . God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!"—Another letter of do., ibid. pp. 85–86.

1516. "Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluco, in which all the cloves grow . . . . Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Bachan, the second Maquian, the third is called Motil, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternaty . . . every year the people of Malaca and Java come to these islands to ship cloves. . . .—Barbosa, 201-202.

1521. "Wednesday the 6th of November . . . we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery . . . since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco."—Pigafetta, Voyage of Magellan (Hak. Soc.), 124.

1553. "We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and by land out up into many thousand islands, these together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth . . . and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco . . . (These) five islands called Maluco . . . stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues . . . we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them five because in that number the clove grows naturally . . . Moreover we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terceiras, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own."—Barros, III., v. 5.

" . . . li molti viaggi dalla città di Lisbona, e dal mar rosso a Calicut, et insino alle Molucche, done nascono le spezierie."—G. B. Ransiusio, Pref. sopra il Libro del Magn. M. Marco Polo.

"As when far off at sea a fleet descried
Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial winds
Close sailing from Bengala, or the Isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs. . . ."

Paradise Lost, ii.

Monegar, s. The title of the headman of a village in the Tamil country; the same as pātīl (Patel) in the Deccan, &c. The word is Tamil mani yakkūran, 'an overseer.'

1707. "Ego Petrus Manicaren, id est Villarum Inspector. . . ."—In Norberti, Mem., i. 390, note.

1717. "Towns and villages are governed by inferior Officers. . . . maniakarar (Mayors or Bailiffs) who hear the complaints."—Phillips, Account, &c., 83.

Monkey-bread Tree, s. The Baobab, Adansonia digitata, L. "a fantastic-looking tree with immense elephant-ine stem and small twisted branches, laden in the rains with large white flowers; found all along the coast of Western India, but whether introduced by the Mahommedans from Africa, or by ocean-currents wafting its large light fruit, full of seed, across from shore to shore, is a nice speculation. A sailor once picked up a large seedy fruit in the Indian Ocean off Bombay, and brought it to me. It was very rotten, but I planted the seeds. It turned out to be Kigelia pinnata of E. Africa, and propagated so rapidly that in a few years I introduced it all over the Bombay Presidency. The Baobab however is generally found most abundant about the old ports frequented by the early Mahommedan traders" (Sir G. Birdwood, MS.).

We may add that it occurs sparsely about Allahabad, where it was introduced apparently in the Mogul time; and in the Gangetic valley as far E. as Calcutta, but always planted. There are, or were, noble specimens in the Botanic Gardens at Calcutta, and in Mr. Arthur Grote's garden at Alipūr.

Monsoon, s. The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Arabic mausim, 'season,' which the Portuguese corrupted into monção, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger's) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali.

"The rationale of the term is well put in the Beirūt Mohūt, which says: 'Mausim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the mausim is the season of working with the silk,'—which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen." W. R. S.

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Cringle.*

* "Don Ricardo began to fret and fidget most awfully—'Beginning of the seasons'—why, we may not get away for a week, and all the ships will be kept back in their loading."—Ed. 1863, p. 309.

The Venetian, Leonardo Ca' Masser (below), calls the monsoons li tempi. And the quotation from Garcia De Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes moução, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual misreading of the written u for n. Lin-schoten in Dutch (1596) has monssoyn and monssoen (p. 8). It thus seems probable that we get our monsoon through the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French form mousson.

We see below (Ces. Feder.) that Monsoon was used as synonymous with "the half year," and so it is still in S. India.

1553. "... and the more, because the voyage from that region of Malacca had to be made by the prevailing wind, which they call monçao, which was now near its end. If they should lose eight days they would have to wait at least three months for the return of the time to make the voyage."—Barros, Dec. II., liv. ii., cap. iv.

1554. "The principal winds are four, according to the Arabs, . . . but the pilots call them by names taken from the rising and setting of certain stars, and assign them certain limits within which they begin or attain their greatest strength, and cease. These winds, limited by space and time, are called Mausim."—The Mohit, by Sidi 'Alī Kapudān, in J. As. Soc. Beng., iii., 548.

"Be it known that the ancient masters of navigation have fixed the time of the monsoon (in orig. doubtless mausim), that is to say, the time of voyages at sea, according to the year of Yazdajird, and that the pilots of recent times follow their steps. . . ." (Much detail on the monsoons follows.)—Ibid.

1563. "The season (monção) for these (i. e., mangoes) in the earlier localities we have in April, but in the other later ones in May and June; and sometimes they come as a rodolho (as we call it in our country) in October and November."—Garcia, f. 134 v.

1568. "Come s'arriua in vna città la prima cosa si piglia vna casa a fitto, ò per mesi ò per anno, seconda che si disegna di starui, e nel Pegù è costume di pigliar-

c. 1665. "... it would be true to say, that the sun advancing towards one Pole, causeth on that side two great regular currents, viz., that of the Sea, and that of the Air which maketh the Mounson-wind, as he causeth two opposite ones, when he returns towards the other Pole."—Bernier, E. Moochulka, s. Hind. muchalkā or muchalka. A written obligation or bond. For special technical uses see

c. 1267. "Five days thereafter judgment was held on Husamuddin the astrologer, who had executed a muchilkai that the death of the Khalif would be the calamity of the world."—Hammer's Golden Horde, 166.

c. 1280. "When he (Kubilai Kaan) approached his 70th year, he desired to raise in his own lifetime, his son Chimkin to be his representative and declared successor. . . . Moochy, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind. mochī. The caste and name are also found in S. India, Telug. mucheche. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer's work, &c.

Mohurrer, Mohrer, &c., s. A writer in a native language. Arab. muharrir, 'an elegant, correct writer.' The word occurs in Grose (c. 1760) as 'Moories, writers.'

Mooktear, s. Properly Hind. from Arab. mukhtār, 'chosen,' but corruptly mukhtyār. An authorised agent; an attorney. Mukhtyār-nama, 'a power of attorney.'

1866. "I wish he had been under the scaffolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtars."—The Dawk Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser's Mag. lxxiii. p. 218.

1878. "These were the mookhtyars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtyars house."—Life in the Mofussil, f. 90.

Moollah, s. Hind. mullā, corr. from Arab. maulā, a der. from wilā, 'propinquity.' This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called maulā. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually 'a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.' In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Korān in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Korān, the servitor who held the book was called in our courts Mullā Korānī. Mullā is also in India the usual Musulman term for 'a schoolmaster.'

1616. "Their Moolaas employ much of their time like Scribes for doo business for others."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

1638. "While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred mutter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Mollas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days. . . ."—Mandelslo, E. T., 63.

1673. "At Funerals, the Mullahs or Priests make Oration or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Alchoran."—Fryer, 94.

1763. "The Mulla in Indostan superintends the practice, and punishes the breach of religious duties."—Orme, reprint, i. 26.

1809. "The British Government have, with their usual liberality, continued the allowance for the Moolaas to read the Koran."—Lord Valentia, i. 423.

1879. ". . . . struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moola."—Sat. Rev., No. 1231, p. 484.

Moolvee, s. Popular Hind. mulvī, Arab. maulavī, from same root as mullā. A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature (Mahommedan).

"A Pundit in Bengal or Molavee

May daily see a carcass burn;

But you can't furnish for the soul of ye

A dirge sans ashes and an urn."

N. B. Halhed, see Calc. Review, vol. xxvi. p. 79.

Moonaul, s. Hind. munāl or monāl (it seems to be in no dictionary). The Lophophorus Impeyanus, most splendid perhaps of all game-birds, rivalling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. "This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas, from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan" (Jerdon). "In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone" (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with (Skt.) muni, 'an eremite'?

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtedly refers to the Munil. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (tom. vii. p. 409 of ed. Ajasson de Grand-sagne, Paris, 1830).

It appears from Jerdon that Monaul is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Cerionis satyra, otherwise sometimes called 'Argus Pheasant' (q.v.).

c. A.D. 350. "Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have a crest, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent into a curve (like a cock's), but flattened out. And this tail they train after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald."—De Nat. Animal. xvi. 2.

Moong, Moongo, s. Or. 'green-gram;' Hind. mūṅg. A kind of vetch (Phaseolus Mungo, L.) in very common use over India; according to Garcia the mesce (mash?) of Avicenna. Garcia also says that it was popularly recommended as a diet for fever in the Deccan.

c. 1336. "The munj again is a kind of māsh, but its grains are oblong and the colour is light green. Munj is cooked along with rice, and eaten with butter. This is what they call Kichri, and it is the dish on which one breakfasts daily."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

1557. "The people were obliged to bring hay, and corn, and munjo, which is a certain species of seed that they feed horses with,"—Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 132.

"Servant-maid.—That girl that you brought from the Deccan asks me for munjo, and says that in her country they give it them to eat, husked and boiled. Shall I give it her?"

"Orta.—Give it her since she wishes it; but bread and a boiled chicken would be better! For she comes from a country where they eat bread, and not rice."—Garcia, f. 145.

Moonga, Mooga, s. Beng. mūgā. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraea assama, collected and manufactured in Assam. The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles ("velleræque ut foliis depectunt tenuia Seres"); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thin into Gangetic India.

1626. "... Moga which is made of the bark of a certain tree."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1005.

c. 1676. "The kingdom of Asem is one of the best countries of all Asia . . . There is a sort of Silk that is found under the trees, which is spun by a Creature like our Silk-worms, but rounder, and which lives all the year long under the trees. The Silks which are made of this Silk glist'n very much, but they fret presently."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 187-188.

1763. "No duties have ever yet been paid on Lacks, Mugga-dooties, and other goods brought from Assam."—In Van Sittart, i. 249.

c. 1778. "... Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga duties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Ls., iii. 174.

Moonshee, s. Arab. munshi, but written in Hind. munshi. The verb insha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means 'to educate' a youth, as well as 'to compose' a written document. Hence 'a secretary, a reader, an interpreter; a writer.' It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, though the application to a native amanuensis in those tongues is also common.

The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. "The Persian Moonshee, by F. Gladwyn," 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1777. "Moonshee. A writer or secretary."—Halhed, Code, 17.

1785. "Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Mūnshy, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received."—Tippoo's Letters, 67.

"A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonshee. . . . The Moonshee, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more substantial evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1600, on the plea that the latter (i.e., Shore) had saved little."—Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814. "They presented me with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durbar munsee."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 365.

1817. "Its authenticity was fully proved by . . . and a Persian Moonshee who translated."—Mill, Hist. v. 127.

1828. ". . . the great Moonshee of State himself had applied the whole of his genius to selecting such flowers of language as would not fail to diffuse joy, when exhibited in those dark and dank regions of the north."—Haji's Baba in England, i. 39.

1867. "When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his rupees as a Moonshee, or a language-master, to that infidel people."—Select Writings of Viscount Strangford, i. 265.

Moonsiff, s. Hind. from Ar. munsif. 'one who does justice' (inṣāf), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1812. ". . . munsifs, or native justices."—Fifth Report, p. 32.

Moor, Moorman, s. (and adj. Moorish). A Mahommedan; and so, from the habitual use of the term (Mouro), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahommedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahommedans were known as Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Batuta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6).

At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—“Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics.”

But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Muslims of Mauritania, who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahommedans were Moors. So the Mahommedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Mouros; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahommedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moors of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixt race, just as the Moplas (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumālis of Magodexo, the Arabs and Persians of Kalhāt and Ormuz, the Boras of Guzerat, are all Mouros to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moors of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boatmen of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahommedanism, Hinduism, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahommedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of this century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiery, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Musliman is still in common use. Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahommedans, or of a certain class of these.

the house when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, in so much that when any of us went ashore, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say 'Portugal, Portugal.'—Roteiro de V. da G. 75.

1553. "And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Frangue, they call in reproach the Christians of our parts of the world Frangues, just as we improperly call them again Moors."—Barros, IV. iv. 16.

c. 1560. "When we lay at Tuquen, we did see certain *Moore*s, who knew so little of their secte that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore."—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Willes, in Hak. ii. 557.

1563. "And as to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calecut and Cochín, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate."—Garcia, f. 30.

1569. ". . . always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of *Moore*s, I mean Mahomets secte."—Cæsar Frederike in Hakl. ii. 359.

1839. "As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-rider,' and began to show off."—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

Moora, s. Sea Hind. mūrā, from Port. amura, Ital. mura; a tack (Roe-buck).

Moorah, s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. it would seem that muḍā and muḍī are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and locally varying measure. But there is also a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Mūdi.

1554. "(At Baçaim) the Mura of batees contains 3 candis, which (batee) is rice in the husk, and after it is stript it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—A. Nunes, 30.

Moorpunky, s. Corr. of Mōr-pānkhi, 'peacock-tailed;' the name given to certain state pleasure-boats on the Gangetic rivers, now only (if at all) surviving at Murshidābād. They are a good deal like the Burmese 'war-boats;' see cut in Mission to Ava (Major Phayre's), p. 4.

1780. "Another boat . . . very curiously constructed, the Moor-punky: these are very long and narrow, sometimes extending to upwards of 100 feet in length, and not more than 8 feet in breadth; they are always paddled, sometimes by 40 men, and are steered by a large paddle from the stern, which rises in the shape of a peacock, a snake, or some other animal."—Hodges, 40.

Moors, The, s. The Hindustani language was in the last century commonly thus styled. The idiom is a curious old English one for the denomination of a language, of which 'broad Scots' is perhaps a type, and which we find exemplified in 'Malabars' for Tamil, whilst we have also met with Bengals for Bengālī, with Indostans for Urdu, and with Turks for Turkish. The term Moors is probably now entirely obsolete, but down to 1830, at least, some old officers of the Royal army and some old Madras civilians would occasionally use the term as synonymous with what the former would also call 'the black language.'

MDCCLXXII."

Captain Hadley's orthography is on a detestable system. He writes chookerau, chookeree, for chokrā, chokrē ('boy, girl'); dolchinney for dāl-chīnē ('cinnamon') &c. His etymological ideas also are loose. Thus he gives 'shrimps' = chinghra mutchee, 'fish with legs or claws,' as if the word was from chang (Pers.), 'a hook or claw.' Bāgdor, 'a halter,' or as he writes, baug-doore, he derives from dur, 'distance,' instead of dor, 'a rope.' He has no knowledge of the instrumental case with terminal ne, and he does not seem to be aware that ham and tum (hum and toom, as he writes) are in reality plurals ('we' and 'you'). The grammar is altogether of a very primitive and tentative character, and far behind that of the R. C. Missionaries, dated 1778, which is referred to s. v. Hindustani. We have not seen that of Schulz (1745) mentioned under the same.

1785. "Old age has certainly made havoc on your understanding, otherwise you would have known that the Mutsuddies here are not the proper persons to determine the market prices there."—Do, p. 118.

Moplah, s. Malayālam, māpilla. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Mahommedans of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton's Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misprinted as madilla.

The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mā-pilla, 'mother's son,' 'as sprung from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women.' Nelson, as quoted below, interprets the word as 'bridegroom' (it should however rather be 'son-in-law')* Dr. Badger again, in a note on Varthema, suggests that it is from the Arabic verb fulāḥa, and means 'a cultivator' (compare the fellah of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic mu'abbar, 'from over the water.' No one of these greatly commends itself.

1516. "In all this country of Malabar there are a great quantity of Moors, who are of the same language and colour as the Gentiles of the country. . . . They call these Moors Mapulers; they carry on nearly all the trade of the seaports."—Barbosa, 146.

1767. "Ali Raja, the Chief of Cananore, who was a Muhammadan, and of the tribe called Mapilla, rejoiced at the success and conquests of a Muhammadan Chief."—H. of Hydrur, p. 184.

Mora, s. Hind. mophā. A stool (tabouret); a footstool. In common colloquial use.

Morchal, s. A fan, or a fly-whisk, made of peacock's feathers. Hind. morch'hal.

1673. "All the heat of the Day they idle it under some shady Tree, at night they come in Troops, armed with a great Pole, a Mirchal or Peacock's Tail, and a Wallet."—Fryer, 95.

1690. (The heat) "makes us Employ our Peons in Fanning of us with Murchals made of Peacock's Feathers, four or five Foot long, in the time of our Entertainments, and when we take our Repose."—Orington, 335.

Mort-de-chien, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of last century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the governorship of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese mordexim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkani and Mahratti moḍachī, moḍ-shī, or moḍwashī, 'cholera,' from a Mahr. verb moḍnen, 'to break up, to sink' (as under infirmities, in fact 'to collapse').

Correa's description is so striking that we give it almost at length:

1543. "This winter (see Winter) they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morxy, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and fowls, so that it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused as some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever could be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong poison; e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the hams and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead, with the eyes broken and the nails of fingers and toes black and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; insomuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day . . . insomuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people . . . and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of morexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the paunch was shrunk up like a hen's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather. . . ."—Correa, iv. 288-289.

"Page.—Don Jeronymo sends to beg that you will go and visit his brother immediately, for, though this is not the time of day for visits, delay would be dangerous, and he will be very thankful that you come at once.

"Orta.—What is the matter with the patient, and how long has he been ill?

"Page.—He has got morxi; and he has been ill two hours.

"Orta.—I will follow you.

"Ruano.—Is this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from? Tell me how it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it.

"Orta.—Our name for the disease is Collerica passio; and the Indians call it morxi; whence again by corruption we call it mordexi. . . . It is sharper here than in our own part of the world, for usually it kills in four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception, I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up* . . . bile, and died at last. Let us go and see this sick man; and as for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is."—Garcia, ff. 74v, 75.

1578. "There is another thing which is useless called by them canarin, which the

Canarin Brahman physicians usually employ for the collerica passio sickness, which they call morxi; which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less."—Acosta, Tractado, 27.

1598. "There reigneth a sickness called Mordexijn which stealeth upon men, and handleth them in such sorte, that it weakeneth a man, and maketh him cast out all that he hath in his bodie, and many times his life withall."—Linschoten, 67.

1599. "The disease which in India is called Colic, This is a species of Colic, which comes on in those countries with such force and vehemence that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. It causes evacuations by stool or vomit, and makes one burst with pain. But there is a herb proper for the cure, which bears the same name of mordescin."—Carletti, 227.

1602. "In those islets (off Aracan) they found bad and brackish water, and certain beans like ours both green and dry, of which they ate some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysentery, which in India they corruptly call mordexim, which ought to be morxis, and which the Arabs call sachaiza, which is what Rasis calls sahida, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse; with cold sweat, great inward fire, and excessive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomitings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (derribada) that the patient seems like a dead man."—Couto, Dec. IV., liv. iv. cap. 10.

c. 1610. "Il regne entre eux vne autre maladie qui vient a l'improviste, ils la nomment Mordessin, et vient avec grande douleur des testes, et vomissement, et orient fort, et le plus souvent en meurent."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 19.

1638. "... celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordexin, qui tue subitement."—Mandelsto, 265.

1648. See also the (questionable) Voyages Fameux du Sieur Victor le Blanc, 76.

c. 1665. "Les Portugais appellent Mordechin les quatre sortes de Coliques qu'on souffre dans les Indes ou elles sont frequentes . . . ceux qui ont la quatrieme souffrent les trois maux ensemble, à savoir le vomissement, le flux de ventre, les extremes douleurs, et je crois que cette derniere est le Colera-Morbus."—Thevenot, v. 324.

1673. "They apply Cauteries most unmercifully in a Mordisheen, called so by the Portugals, being a Vomiting with Looseness."—Fryer, 114.

1690. "The Mordechine is another Disease . . . which is a violent Vomiting and Looseness."—Ovington, 350.

c. 1690. Rumphius, speaking of the Jack-fruit (q.v.): "Non nisi vacuo stomacho edendus est, alias enim . . . plerumque oritur Passio Choleric, Portugallis Mordexi dicta."—Herb. Amb., i. 106.

1702. "Cette grande indigestion qu'on appelle aux Indes Mordechin, et que quelques uns de nos François ont appelée Mort-de Chien."—Lettres Edif. xi. 156.

Bluteau (s.v.) says Mordexim is properly a failure of digestion which is very perilous in those parties, unless the native remedy be used. This is to apply a thin iron, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705. "Ce mals s'appelle mort-de-chien."—Luillier, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique :

1716. "The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the Cholick, and what they call the Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron."—Acct. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roque's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, etc., E. T., London, 1726, p. 155.

1727. "... the Mordexin (which seizes one suddenly with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 5.

c. 1760. "There is likewise known, on the Malabar coast chiefly, a most violent disorder they call the Mordechin; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and termina of the intestines, that it will often carry him off in 30 hours."—Grose, i. 250.

1768. "This disease (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien."—Lind, Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778. In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammatica Indostana, we find Mordechim, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hind. by the word badazmi, i.e., bad-hazmi, 'dyspepsia' (p. 99). The most common modern Hind. term for cholera is (the Arab.) haizah. The latter word is given by Garcia De Orta in the form hachaiza, and in the quotation from Couto as sachariza (?). Jahangir speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Deccan, of haizah, in A.D. 1615 (see note to Elliot, vi. 346). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that haizah always means cholera. Thus Macpherson mentions that a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzib at Bijapur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khafi Khan (Elliot, vii. 337) the general phrases tā'un and wabā are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781. "Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien."—Curtis, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1782. "Les indigestions appellées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent attaquées. . . ."—Sonnerat, i. 205.

This author writes thus just after having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Flux aigu. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1783. "A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants."—Forbes, Oriental Memoirs, iv. 122.

1796. "Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colic, called by the Indians shami, mordexim, and also Nivcomben. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains . . . the consequence is that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fevers, and stupefaction; so that persons attacked with the disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day. . . . In the year 1782 this disease raged with so much fury that a great many persons died of it."—Fra Paolino, Eng. Transl., 409-10 (orig. see p. 353).

As to the names used by Fra Paolino, for his Shami or Ciani, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. sanni, 'convulsion, paralysis.' (Winslow in his Tamil Dict. specifies 13 kinds of sanni. Komben is explained as 'a kind of cholera or small-pox (!); and nir-komben ('water-k.') as 'a kind of cholera or bilious diarrhoea.') Paolino adds: "La droga amara costa assai, e non si poteva amministrate a tanti miserabili che perivano. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillassimo in Tigara, o acqua vitedi coco, molto sterco di cavalli (!), e l'amministriamo agl' infermi. Tutti quelli che prendevano questa guarivano."

1808. "Môrheee or Mortshee (Guz.) and Môdee (Mah.). A morbid affection in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage up and down, with intolerable tenesmus, or twisting-like sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbus of European synopsis, called by the country people in England (?) mortisheen, and by others mord-du-chien and Maua des chienes, as if it had come from France."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author was, we presume, from his title of "Dr." a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with:

1812. "General M***** was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort de chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes."—Original Familiar Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1846, p. 287.

1813. "Mort de chien is nothing more than the highest degree of Cholera Morbus."—Johnson, Infl. of Tropical Climate, 405.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as sporadic disease or as epidemic, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name be given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Empoli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1517, the ships' crews were attacked by a pessima malattia di frusso (virulent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these Giovanni himself, and two other Florentines (Vita, in Archivio Storico Italiano, 33). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goa pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1756, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of its raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearce, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst "death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described." The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feby. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and it is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The paucity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr. Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great recrudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Jan'y. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of those publications.

Mordexim, or Mordixim, s. Also the name of a sea-fish. Bluteau says 'a fish found at the Isle of Quixembe on the Coast of Mozambique, very like bogas (?) or river-pikes.'

Mosellay, n.p. A site at Shīrūz often mentioned by Hafiz as a favourite spot, and near which is his tomb.

c. 1850.

"Boy! let yon liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
Whate'er the frowning zealots say;
Tell them that Eden cannot show
A stream so clear as Roccabad;
A bower so sweet as Mosellay."
Hafiz, rendered by Sir W. Jones.

1811. "The stream of Rūknabād murmured near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mosellā and the Tomb of Hafiz."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 318.

1813. "Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mosella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower."—Macdonald Kinneir's Persia, 62.

Mosque, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Arab. masjid, 'a place of worship,' literally the place of sujūd, i.e. 'prostration.' And the probable course is this. Masjid becomes (1) in Spanish mezquita, (Port. mesquita); * (2) Ital. meschita, moschea; French (old), mosquete, mosquée; (3) Eng. mosque. Some of the quotations might suggest a different course of modification, but they would probably mislead.

Apropos of masjid rather than of mosque we have noted a ludicrous misapplication of the word in the advertisement of a newspaper story. "Musjeed the Hindoo: Adventures with the Star of India in the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857." The Weekly Detroit Free Press, London, July 1, 1882.

1543. "And with the stipulation that the 5000 larin tangas which in old times were granted, and are deposited for the expenses of the mizquitas of Baçaim, are to be paid from the said duties as they always have been paid, and in regard to the said mizquitas and the prayers that are made in them there shall be no innovation whatever."—Treaty at Baçaim of the Portuguese with King Bador of Canbaya (Bahadur Shah of Guzerat) in S. Botelho, Tombo, 137.

1553. ". . . but destined yet to unfurl that divine and royal banner of the Soldiery of Christ . . . in the Eastern regions of Asia, amidst the infernal mesquitas of Arabia and Persia, and all the pagodes of the heathenism of India, on this side and beyond the Ganges."—Barros, I, i. 1.

1616. "They are very jealous to let their women or Moschees be seen."—Sir T. Roe in Purchas, i. 537.

"Que a de abominação mesquita immūda Casa, a Deos dedicada hoje se veja."
Malaca Conquistada, l. xii. 43.

1638. Mandelso unreasonably applies the term to all sorts of pagan temples, e.g.:—"Nor is it only in great Cities that the Benjans have their many Mosqueys . . ."
—Eng. Tr., 2d ed., 1669, p. 52.

"The King of Siam is a Pagan, nor do his Subjects know any other Religion. They have divers Mosquees, Monasteries, and Chappels."—Id., p. 104.

c. 1662. ". . . he did it only for love to their Mammon; and would have sold afterwards for as much more St. Peter's . . . to the Turks for a Mosquito."—Cowley, Discourse concerning the Govt. of O. Cromwell.

1719. "On condition they had a Cowle (q.v.) granted, exempting them from paying the Pagoda or Musquet duty."—In Wheeler, ii. 301.

1727. "There are no fine Buildings in the City, but many large Houses, and some Caravanserays and Muscheits."—A. Ham., i. 161.

c. 1760. "The Roman Catholic Churches, the Moorish Moschs, the Gentoo Pagodas, the worship of the Parsees, are all equally unmolested and tolerated."—Grose, i. 44.

* According to Pylard mesquite is the word used in the Maldiv Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Egypt now; the older and probably the most widely diffused.

Mosquito, s. A gnat is so-called in the tropics. The word is Spanish and Port. (dim. of mosca, 'a fly') and probably came into familiar English use from the East Indies, though the earlier quotations show that it was first brought from S. America. A friend annotates here :

"Arctic mosquitoes are worst of all ; and the Norfolk ones (in the Broad) beat Calcutta !"

It is related of a young Scotch lady of a former generation, who on her voyage to India had heard formidable, but vague, accounts of this terror of the night, that on seeing an elephant for the first time she asked : "Will you be what's called a musqueetae ?"

1539. "To this misery was there adjoined the great affliction, which the Flies and Gnats (por parte dos atabões e mosquitos), that coming out of the neighbouring Woods, bit and stung us in such sort, as not one of us but was gore blood."—Pinto (orig. cap. xxiii.), in Cogan, p. 29.

1582. "We were oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fly, which in the Indian tongue is called Tiquari, and the Spanish call them Muskitos."—Miles Phillips, in Hak., iii. 564.

1584. "The 29 Day we set Saile from Saint Johns, being many of vs stung before upon Shoare with the Muskitos ; but the same night we tooke a Spanish Frigate."—Sir Richard Greeneville's Voyage, in Hak. iii. 308.

1616 and 1673. See both Terry and Fryer under Chints.

1662. "At night there is a kind of insect that plagues one mightily ; they are called Muscieten,—it is a kind that by their noise and sting cause much irritation."—Saer, 68-69.

1673. "The greatest Pest is the Mosquito, which not only wheals, but domineers by its continual Hums."—Fryer, 189.

1690. (The Governor) "carries along with him a Peon or Servant to Fan him, and drive away the busie Flies, and troublesome Musketoes. This is done with the Hair of a Horse's Tail."—Ovington, 227-8.

1740. "... all the day we were pestered with great numbers of muscatos, which are not much unlike the gnats in England, but more venomous. . . ."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed., 1756, p. 46.

"Mosquitos, sandflies, seek the sheltered roof,

And with full rage the stranger guest assail,

Nor spare the sportive child."

Grainger, bk. i.

1883. "Among rank weeds in deserted Bombay gardens, too, there is a large, speckled, unmusical mosquito, raging and importunate and thirsty, which will give a new idea in pain to any one that visits its haunts."—Tribes on My Frontier, 27.

Moturpha, s. Hind. from Arab. Muhtarafa, but according to C. P. B. Mu'tarifa. A name technically applied to a number of miscellaneous taxes in Madras and Bombay, such as were called Sayer (q.v.), in Bengal.

Moulmein, n.p. This is said to be originally a Talaing name Mut-mwootem, syllables which mean (or may be made to mean), 'one-eye-destroyed ;' and to account for which a cock-and-bull legend is given (probably invented for the purpose).* The Burmese corrupted the name into Mau-la-myaing, whence the foreign (probably Malay) form Maulmain. The place so called is on the opposite side of the estuary of the Salwin R. from Martaban (q.v.) and has entirely superseded that once famous port. Moulmein, a mere site, was chosen as the head-quarters of the Tenasserim provinces, when these became British in 1826 after the first Burmese war. It has lost political importance since the annexation of Pegu, 26 years later, but is a thriving city which numbered, in 1881, 53,107 inhabitants.

Mount Dely, n.p. See Delly, Mount.

Mouse-deer. The beautiful little creature Meminna indica (Gray), found in various parts of India, and weighing under 6 lbs., is so called. But the name is also applied to several pigmy species of the genus Tragulus, found in the Malay regions. All belong to the family of the Musk-deer.

Muchán, s. H. machān, and Decc. manchān (Skt. mancha). An elevated platform ; such as the floor of huts among the Indo-Chinese races ; or a stage or scaffolding erected to watch for a tiger, to guard a field, or what not.

c. 1662. "As the soil of the country is very damp, the people do not live on the ground-floor, but on the machān, which is the name for a raised floor."—Shihābuddīn Tālish, by Blochmann, in J. A. S. B. xli. Pt. i. 84.

"Tradition says that the city was founded . . . by a king with three eyes, having an extra eye in his forehead, but that, by the machinations of a woman, the eye in his forehead was destroyed . . ."—Mason's Burmah, 2nd ed., p. 18.

Muchwa, s. Mahr. machwā, a kind of boat or barge in use about Bombay.

Muckna, s. Hind. makhnā. A male elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, "not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grubbers, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter." (The Rifle and Hound, in Ceylon, 11.) Sanderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, 1879), says: "On the Continent of India mucknas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare . . . Mucknas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted." This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were mucknas. But the definition of a makhnā in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the 'short grubbers' of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partly due to a preference in purchasers.*

The same author derives the term from mukh, 'face'; but the reason is obscure. Shakespear gives the word as also applied to 'a cock without spurs.'

c. 1780. "An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unlucky, and not saleable; the mukna or elephant born without teeth is thought the best."—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 194.

Mucoa, Mukuva, n.p. Malayal, and Tamil, mukkuwan (sing.), 'a diver,' and mukkuvar (pl.). A name applied to the fishermen of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin, among whom, and among the corresponding class of Paravars (q.v.) on the east coast, F. Xavier's most noted labours in India occurred.

* Sir George Yule notes: "I can distinctly call to mind 6 mucknas that I had (I may have had more) out of 30 or 40 elephants that passed through my hands." This would give 15 or 20 per cent. of mucknas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson's 5 out of 51 males.

1525. "And Dom João had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaos (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to houses that stood round the fort. . . . So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes . . . put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ashes, after the fashion of jogues . . . also defiling his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jogue, whilst he tied under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow-match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and, as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macuas, which are fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual palaver of the jogues, i.e., prayers for their long life and health, and the conquest of enemies, and easy deliveries for their womenkind, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things."—Correa, ii. 871.

1552. Barros has mucuaría, 'a fisherman's village.'

1600. "Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macóas; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such fervour that the Father found himself at times with 5000 or 6000 souls about him."—Lucena, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 117.

1615. "Edixit ut Macuæ omnes, id est villissima plebecula et piscatu vivens, Christiana sacra susciperent."—Jarric, i. 390.

1626. "The Muchoa or Mechoe are Fishers . . . the men Theeues, the women Harlots, with whom they please. . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

1727. "They may marry into lower Tribes . . . and so may the Muckwas, or Fishers, who, I think, are a higher tribe than the Poulias."—A. Ham., i. 310.

1745. "The Macóas, a kind of Malabars, who have specially this business, and, as we might say, the exclusive privilege in all that concerns sea-faring."—Norbert, i. 227-8.

1760. "Fifteen massoolas accompanied the ships; they took in 170 of the troops, besides the Macóas, who are the black fellows that row them."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 617.

Muddār, s. Hind. madār. Calotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Asclepiadaceæ. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark fibre is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilization. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, combined with cotton, but as yet without practical success. The plant abounds with an acrid milky juice which the Rājputs are said to employ for infanticide. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called āk in Rājputānā and Sind. See Ak.

Muddle, s. (?) This word is only known to us from the clever—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budlee (q.v. in Suppt.).

1836-7. "Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistress."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"They always come accompanied by their Vakeels, a kind of Secretaries, or interpreters, or flappers,—their muddles in short; everybody here has a muddle, high or low."—Id. 86.

Mugg, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson's definition of this obscure name: "A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong." It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz., the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognized by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note:

"There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Magu, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Behar). The Kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this ace. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Montg. Martin, ii. 18, seqq.). The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahomedan writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh=magus.

The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1585. "The Mogen, which be of the Kingdom of Recon (see Arakan) and Rame, be stronger than the King of Tipara; so that Chatigam or Porto Grande (q.v.) is often under the King of Recon."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 389.

c. 1590. (In a country adjoining Pegu) "there are mines of ruby and diamond and gold and silver and copper and petroleum and sulphur and (the lord of that country) has war with the tribe of Magh about the mines; also with the tribe of Tipara there are battles."—Ain (orig.) i. 388.

c. 1604. "Defeat of the Magh Rājā.—This short-sighted Rājā . . . became elated with the extent of his treasures and the number of his elephants. . . . He then openly rebelled, and assembling an army at Sunārgānw laid siege to a fort in that vicinity . . . Rājā Mān Singh . . . despatched a force. . . These soon brought the Magh Rājā and all his forces to action . . . regardless of the number of his boats and the strength of his artillery."—Indyat-ullah, in Elliot, vi. 109.

1638. "Submission of Manek Rāī, the Mag Rājā of Chittagong."—Abdul-Hamid Lahori in do., vii. 66.

c. 1665. "These many years there have always been in the Kingdom of Bakan or Moy (read Mog), some Portuguese, and with them a great number of their Christian Slaves, and other Franguis. . . . That was the refuge of the Run-aways from Goa, Ceylan, Cochin, Malayue (Malacca), and all these other places which the Portugueses formerly held in the Indies."—Bernier, E. T., p. 53.

1676. "In all Bengala this King (of Arakan) is known by no other name but the King of Mogue."—Tavernier, E. T., i. 8.

1752. ". . . That as the time of the Mugs draws nigh, they request us to order the pinnacle to be with them by the end of next month."—In Long, p. 87.

c. 1810. "In a paper written by Dr. Leyden, that gentleman supposes . . . that Magadha is the country of the people whom we call Muggs. . . . The term Mugg, these people assured me, is never used by either themselves or by the Hindus, except when speaking the jargon commonly called Hindustani by Europeans. . . .—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, ii. 18.

1811. "Mugs, a dirty and disgusting people, but strong and skilful. They are somewhat of the Malayan race."—Solvyns, iii.

1866. "That vegetable curry was excellent. Of course your cook is a Mug?"—The Dawn Bungalow, 389.

Muggur, s. Hind. and Mahr. magar and makar, probably from Skt. makara, a sea-monster (see under Macareo). The destructive broad-snouted crocodile of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, formerly called Crocodilus biporcatus, now apparently subdivided into several sorts or varieties.

1611. "Alagaters or Crocodiles there called Murgur match . . ."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 436.

The word is here intended for magarmats or -mach, 'crocodile-fish.'

1878. "The muggur is a gross pleb, and his features stamp him low-born. His manners are coarse."—Ph. Robinson, in My Indian Garden, 82-3.

1879. "En route I killed two crocodiles; they are usually called alligators, but that is a misnomer. It is the mugger . . . these muggers kill a good many people, and have a playful way of getting under a boat, and knocking off the steersman with their tails, and then swallowing him afterwards."—Pollok, Sport, &c., i. 168.

1881. "Alligator leather attains by use a beautiful gloss, and is very durable . . . and it is possible that our rivers contain a sufficient number of the two varieties of crocodile, the muggar and the garial, for the tanners and leather-dressers of Cawnpore to experiment upon."—Pioneer Mail, April 26th. See under Nuzzur.

Muggrabee, n.p. Arab. maghrabi, 'western.' This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is, as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Hayraddin Mograbbin of Quentin Durward.

1563. "The proper tongue in which Avicena wrote is that which is used in Syria and Mesopotamia and in Persia and in Tartary (from which latter Avicena came) and this tongue they call Araby; and that of our Moors they call Magaraby, as much as to say Moorish of the West. . ."—Garcia, f. 19v.

Mull, s. A contraction from mulligatawny (q.v.), and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called

Qui-his, and Bombay people Ducks (qq.v., see also Benighted).

Mulligatawny, s. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil mīlagu-tannir, 'pepper-water'; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence, and not merely from the complexion acquired there, — the sobriquet of the preceding article.

"In vain our hard fate we repine;
In vain on our fortune we rail;
On Mullaghee-tawny we dine,
Or Congee, in Bangalore Jail."

Song by a Gentleman of the Navy
Seton-Karr, i. 18.

1873. "In Mulligatawny soup, as we should expect from its excellence in curries, Australian meat forms a very serviceable ingredient."—Sat. Review, May 24, 1873, p. 691.

Mulmull, s. Muslin; Hind. malmaul.

1683. "Ye said Ellis told your Petitioner that he would not take 500 Pieces of your Petitioner's mulmulls unless your Petitioner gave him 200 Rups. which your Petitioner being poor could not do."—Petition of Rogoodee, Weaver of Hugly, in Hedges, March 26.

1705. "Malle-molles et autre diverses sortes de toiles . . . stingerques et les belles mousselines."—Luvillier, 78.

Muncheel, Manjeel, s. This word is proper to the S. W. Coast; Malayāl. manjāl from Skt. mancha. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palanquin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy (q.v.) of the Himālaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561. ". . . He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent upwards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth . . . the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen . . .

1811. "The Inquisition is about a quarter of a mile distant from the convent, and we proceeded thither in manjeels."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2nd ed., 171.

1819. "Muncheel, a kind of litter resembling a sea-cot or hammock, hung to a long pole, with a moveable cover over the whole, to keep off the sun or rain. Six men will run with one from one end of the Malabar coast to the other, while twelve are necessary for the lightest palanquin."—Welsh, ii. 142.

1862. "We . . . started . . . in Muncheels or hammocks, slung to bamboos, with a shade over them, and carried by six men, who kept up unearthly yells the whole time."—Markham, Peru and India, 353.

A form of this word is used at Réunion, where a kind of palanquin is called "le manchy." It gives a title to one of Leconte de Lisle's Poems :

c. 1858.

Sous un nuage frais de claire mousseline
Tous les dimanches au matin,
Tu venais à la ville en manchy de rotin,
Par les rampes de la colline."

Le Manchy.

The word has also been introduced by the Portuguese into Africa in the forms maxilla, and machilla.

1810. ". . . tangas, que elles chamão maxilas."—Annaes Maritimas, iii. 434.

1880. "The Portuguese (in Quilliman) seldom even think of walking the length of their own street, and . . . go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a machilla (pronounced masheela). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the natives, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each machilla requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in E. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

Mongoose, s. This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumon, represented in the South by Mangusta Mungos (Elliot), or Herpestes griseus (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes malaccensis. The word is Telugu, mangusu. In Upper India the animal is called newal or nyaul. Jerdon gives mangūs however as a Deccani and Mahratti word.

1673. ". . . A Mongoose is akin to a Ferret. . . ."—Fryer, 116.

1681. "The knowledge of these antidotal herbs they have learned from the Moungutia, a kind of Ferret."—Knox, 115.

1685. "They have what they call a

Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeyro, f. 56v.

Bluteau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon tr. from Port. into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 153. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeyro.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is illtempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774. "He (the Dharma Raja of Bhoontan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mungos, which he is very fond of."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, 27.

1790. "His (Mr. Glan's) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mungoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes . . . but that the poison of snakes is, to this animal, innocent."—Letter in Colebrooke's Life, p. 40.

1829. "Il Monguse animale simile ad una donnola."—Papi, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viagg. Ital., p. 279.

Munsubdar, s. Hind. from Pers. manṣabdār, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. manṣab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant.

c. 1665. "Mansebdars are Cavaliers of Manseb, which is particular and honourable Pay; not so great indeed as that of the Omrahs . . . they being esteemed as little Omrahs, and of the rank of those, that are advanced to that dignity."—Bernier, E. T., p. 67.

1673. "Munsubdars or petty omrahs."—Fryer, p. 195.

1758. ". . . . A munsubdar or commander of 6000 horse."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. p. 278.

Muntra, s. Sansk. Mantra, a text of the Vedas; a magical formula.

1612. ". . . . Trata da causa primeira, segundo os livros que tem, chamados Terum, Mandra mole. . . ."—Couto, Dec. V., liv. vi. cap. 8.

This is mantra-mīla, the latter word = 'text.'

1817. "... he is said to have found the great mantra, spell or talisman."—Mill's British India, ii. 149.

Muntree, s. Sansk. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derived their ancient civilisation from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1810. "When the Court was full, and Ibrahim, the son of Candu the merchant, was near the throne, the Raja entered. ... But as soon as the Raja seated himself, the muntries and high officers of state arrayed themselves according to their rank."—In a Malay's account of Government House at Calcutta, transl. by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, p. 200.

Munzil, s. Ar. manzil, 'descending or alighting,' hence the halting place of a stage or march, a day's stage.

1685. "We were not able to reach Obdeen-deen (ye usual Menzill) but lay at a sorry Caravan Sarai."—Hedges, July 30.

Muscát, n.p., properly Māskūt. A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time past the capital of 'Omān. See Imaum.

Music. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of western music which they appreciate and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1860, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! it is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the hearers became insensible (behosh).'

1780. "The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives. They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 33.

Musk, s. We get this word from the Lat. musculus, Greek μόςχος, and the latter must have been got, probably through Persian, from the Sansk. mushka, the literal meaning of which is rendered in the old English phrase 'a cod of musk.' The oldest known European mention of the article is that which we give from St. Jerome; the oldest medical prescription is in a work of Aetius, of Amida (c. 540).

In the quotation from Cosmas the word used is μόςχος, and kastūri is a Skt. name, still, according to Royle, applied to the musk-deer in the Himalaya. The transfer of the name to (or from) the article called by the Greeks καστόριον, which is an analogous product of the beaver, is curious.

The musk-deer (Moschus moschiferus, L.) is found throughout the Himalaya at elevations rarely (in summer) below 8000 feet, and extends east to the borders of Szechuen, and north to Siberia.

c. 390. "Odoris autem suavitas, et diversa thymiamata, et amomum, et cypri, oenanthe, muscus, et peregrini muris pellicula, quod dissolutis et amatoribus conveniat, nemo nisi dissolutus negat."—St. Jerome, in Lib. Secund. adv. Jovinianum, ed. Vallarsii, ii. col. 337.

c. 545. "This little animal is the Musk (μόςχος). The natives call it in their own tongue καστόριον. They hunt it and shoot it, and binding tight the blood collected about the navel they cut this off, and this is the sweet-smelling part of it, and what we call musk."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi.

1673. "Musk. It is best to buy it in the Cod . . . that which openeth with a bright Musk colour is best."—Fryer, p. 212.

Musk-Rat, s. The popular name of the Sorex caeruleus, Jerdon, an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously remarks, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling. When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly.

Can this be the mus peregrinus mentioned by St. Jerome (above under Musk), as P. Vincenzo supposes?

c. 1590. "Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also mice that have a fine musky scent."—Ayeen, by Gladwyn (1800), ii. 166.

1672. P. Vincenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal, (il ratto del musco) which occurred in the Capuchin Convent at Surat, says with simplicity (or malignity)?

"I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant* in the vicinity of these most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation."—Viaggio, p. 385.

1681. "This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Muskrats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do."—Knox, p. 31.

1813. See Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 42.

Muslin, s. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mausal or Mausil) on the Tigris,† and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent tissue to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ mausili in the same sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights, Macnaghten's ed., i. 176, and ii. 159, in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban. The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1298. "All the cloths of gold and silk that are called Mosolins are made in this country (Mausul)."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. chap. 5.

c. 1544. "Almussoli est regio in Mesopotamia, in qua texuntur telae ex bombyce valde pulchrae, quae apud Syros et Aegyptios et apud mercatores Venetos appellantur mussoli, ex hoc regionis nomine. Et principes Aegyptii et Syri, tempore aestatis sedentes in loco honoratiori induunt vestes ex hujusmodi mussoli."—Andreae Bellunenstis, Arabicorum nominum quae in libris Avicennae sparsim legebantur Interpretatio.

1573. "... You have all sorts of Cotton-works, Handkerchiefs, long Fillets, Girdles . . . and other sorts, by the Aravians called Mossellini (after the Country Mussoli, from whence they are brought,

† We have seen, however, somewhere an ingenious suggestion that the word really came from Maisolia (the country about Masulipatam, according to Ptolemy), which even in ancient times was famous for fine cotton textures.

c. 1580. "For the rest the said Agriani (misprint for Bagnani, Banyans) wear clothes of white mussolo or sessa (?); having their garments very long and crossed over the breast."—Gaspario Balbi, f. 33 b.

1673. "Le drap qu'on estend sur les matelas est d'une toile aussi fine que de la mousseline."—App. to Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 198.

1685. "I have been told by several, that muscelin (so much in use here for cravats) and Calligo (!), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of nettles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray Correspondence, 1848, p. 163.

c. 1760. "This city (Mosul)'s manufacture is Mussolin (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets."—Ives, Voyage from England to India, &c., p. 324.

Musnud, s. Hind. Arab. masnad, from root sanad, 'he leaned or rested against it.' The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752. "Salabat-jing . . . went through the ceremony of sitting on the musnud or throne."—Orme, i. 250, ed. 1803.

1803. "The Peshwah arrived yesterday, and is to be seated on the musnud."—A. Wellesley, in Munro's Life, i. 343.

1809. "In it was a musnud, with a carpet, and a little on one side were chairs on a white cloth."—Lord Valentia, i. 346.

1824. "They spread fresh carpets, and prepared the royal musnud, covering it with a magnificent shawl."—Hajji Baba, p. 142, ed. 1835.

Mussalla, s. Pers. Hind. (with change of sense from Arab. maṣāliḥ, pl. of maṣlahah), 'materials, ingredients.' Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like.

There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to "rough it on chuprasees and mussaulchees (qq.v.)," meaning chupatties and mussalla.

1780. "A dose of marsall, or purgative spices."—Munro, Narrative, 85.

1809. "At the next hut the woman was grinding missala or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin."—Maria Graham, 20.

Mussaul, s. Hind. from Arab.

mask'al, a torch. It usually is made of rags wrapt round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

c. 1407. "Suddenly, in the midst of the night they saw the Sultan's camp approaching, accompanied by a great number of mask'al."—Abdurazzak, in N. & Ext. xiv., Pt. i. 153.

1673. "The Duties * march like Furies with their lighted mussals in their hands, they are Pots filled with Oyl in an Iron Hoop like our Beacons, and set on fire by stinking rags."—Fryer, 33.

1705. "... flambeaux qu'ils appellent Mansalles."—Luillier, 89.

1809. "These Mussal or link-boys."—Ld. Valentia, i. 17.

1810. "The Mosaul, or flambeau, consists of old rags, wrapped very closely round a small stick."—Williamson, V. M. i. 219.

Mussaulchee, s. Hind. mask'alchī from mask'al (see last) with the Turki terminal chī, generally implying an agent. The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran alongside of a palankin on a night-journey, bearing a mussaul (q.v.). The word is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valentia, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase 'a scullion.'

1610. "He always had in service 500 Massalgees."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 432.

1662. (In Asam) "they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a mask'alchī [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp."—Shihabuddin Tālish, tr. by Blochmann, in J. A. S. B., xli. Pt. i. 82.

1673. "Trois Massalgis du Grand Seigneur vinrent faire honneur à M. l'Ambassadeur avec leurs feux allumés."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 103.

1686. "After strict examination he chose out 2 persons, the Chout (Chous?), an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Mossalagee, a person who carries the light before me in the night."—Hedges, July 2.

1791. "... un masolchi, ou porte-flambeau, pour la nuit."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 16.

- Deoti, a torch-bearer. Thus Baber: "If the emperor or chief nobility (in India) at any time have occasion for a light by night, these filthy Deutis bring in their lamps, which they carry up to their master, and stand holding it close by his side."—Baber, 333.

1809. "It is universally the custom to drive out between sunset and dinner. The Mussalchees, when it grows dark, go out to meet their masters on their return, and run before them, at the full rate of eight miles an hour, and the numerous lights moving along the esplanade produce a singular and pleasing effect."—Ld. Valentia, i. 240.

1813. "The occupation of massaulchee, or torch-bearer, although generally allotted to the village barber, in the purgannas under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 417.

1826. "After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 200 men, accompanied by Mussalchees or torch-bearers."—Pandurang Hart, 557.

Mussendom, Cape, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance to the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of 'Omān. The name is written Masāndim in the map which Dr. Badger gives with his H. of 'Omān. But it is Rās Masandam (or possibly Masandūm) in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān (J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 459). Sprenger writes Mosandam (Alt. Geog. Arabiens, p. 107).

1516. "... it (the coast) trends to the N.E. by N. 30 leagues until Cape Mocondon, which is at the mouth of the Sea of Persia."—Barbosa, 32.

1553. "... before you come to Cape Mocondan, which Ptolemy calls Asaboro (Ἀσαβόρον ἄκρον) and which he puts in 23½°, but which we put in 26°; and here terminates our first division" (of the Eastern Coasts).—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1572. "Olha o cabo Asabóro que chamado Agora he Mocondan dos navegantes: Por aqui entrã o lago, que he fechado De Arabia, e Persias terras abundantes."—Camões, x. 102.

By Burton:
"Behold of Asabón the Head, now hight Mosandam, by the men who plough the Main:
Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Bight, parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the poet copies the misprint or mistake of Barros in Asaboro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1673. "On the one side St. Jaques (see Jask) his Headland, on the other that of Mussendown appeared, and afore Sunset we entered the Straights Mouth."—Fryer, 221.

1727. "The same Chain of rocky Mountains continue as high as Zoar, above Cape Musenden, which Cape and Cape Jaques begin the Gulf of Persia."—A. Hamilton, i. 71.

1777. "At the mouth of the Strait of Mocandon, which leads into the Persian gulph, lies the island of Gombroon (?)—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 86.

Mussoola, Mussoolah Boat, s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of capacious size, and formed of planks sewn together with coir-twine; the open joints being made good with a caulking or wadding of twisted coir.

The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "masoula . . . the Mahratta term for fish" (Morton's Life of Leyden, 64). As a matter of fact the Mahratti word for fish is māsōl, Konk. māsūl. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below). But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from Arab. masad, 'the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it.' Another suggestion is from the Arab. mausūl, 'joined,' as opposed to 'dug-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from mahsūl, 'tax,' if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

c. 1560. "Spaventosa cosa'è chi nō ha più visto, l'imbarcare e sbarcar le mercantie e le persone a San Tomè . . . adoperano certe barchette fatte apostà molto alte e larghe, ch'essi chiamano Masudi, e sono fatte con tauole sottili, e con corde sottili cusite insieme vna tauola con l'altre," etc. (there follows a very correct description of their use).—C. Federici, in Ramus, iii. 391.

c. 1580. ". . . where (Negapatam) they cannot land anything but in the Maqules of the same country."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 93.

c. 1582. ". . . There is always a heavy sea there (San Thomé), from swell or storm; so the merchandise and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boatmen pull with great force, and so run ashore; and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the beach is covered with sand, and the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—G. Balbi, f. 89.

1673. "I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten Men paddle, the two foremost of whom are Steersmen, using their Paddles instead of a Rudder. The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers, as ours are; the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-Yarn of the Cocoe, and calked with Dammar (a Sort of Resin taken out of the Sea) so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Fryer, 37.

1760. "As soon as the yawls and pin-naces reached the surf they dropped their graplings, and cast off the masoolas, which immediately rowed ashore, and landed the troops."—Orme, iii. 617.

1762. "No European boat can land, but the Natives make use of a boat of a particular construction called a Mausolo," etc.—MS. letter of James Rennell, April 1st.

1783. "The want of Massoola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colebrooke, 9.

1826. "The masuli-boats (which first word is merely a corruption of 'muchli,' fish) have been often described, and except that they are sewed together with coco-nut twine, instead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats . . . on the Ganges."—Heber, ii. 174 (ed. 1844).

1879. "Madras has no harbour; nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Masulah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Saty. Review, Sept. 20.

Mussuck, s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, stript of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhishtī (see Bheesty.) Hind. mashak.

1842. "Might it not be worth while to try the experiment of having 'mussucks' made of waterproof cloth in England?"—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 220.

Mussulman, adj. and s. Mahommedan. Muslim, 'resigning,' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahommed to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is Muslimān, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word Muslimān or Masalmān thus formed.

1246. "Intravimus terram Bisermi-norum. Isti homines linguam Comanicam loquebantur, et adhuc loquuntur; sed legem Sarracenorum tenent."—Piano Carpini, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 750.

1559. "Although each horde (of Tartars) has its proper name, e.g. particularly the horde of the Savolhensians . . . and many others, which are in truth Mahometans; yet do they hold it for a grievous insult and reproach to be called and styled Turks; they wish to be styled Besermiani, and by this name the Turks also desire to be styled."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii. f. 171.

c. 1580. "Tutti sopradetti Tartari seguitano la fede de' Turchi et alla Turchesca credono, masi tēgono a gran vergogna, e molto si corrociano l'esser detti Turchi, secondo che all' incontro godono d'esser Besurmani, cioè gēte eletta, chiamati."—Descrittione della Sarmatia Europea del magn. caval. *Aless. 1673. "Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an end drunken Beggars of the Musslemen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse . . . are presently upon their Punctilio's with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rags, and the Coffery (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus?"—Fryer, 91.

1788. "We escape an ambiguous termination by adopting Moslem instead of Musulman in the plural number."—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

Must, adj. Pers. mast, 'drunk.' It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

Mustees, Mestiz, &c. s. A half-caste. A corruption of the Portuguese mestiço, having the same meaning; * French, métis and métif.

1546. "The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu), ordered that all the mestiços who were in Dio should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them,—subject to the King's confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestiço of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it."—Correa, iv. 580.

1552. ". . . . the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them a number of the natives, Moors in belief, and Negroes with curly hair in appearance, and some of them only swarthy, as being mistiços."—Barros, i. ii. 1.

1586. ". . . . che se sono nati qua di donne indiane, gli domandano mestizi."—Sassetti in De Gubernatis, 188.

1588. ". . . . An interpretour . . . which was a Mestizo, that is halfe an Indian, and halfe a Portugall."—Candlish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

c. 1610. "Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestifs, les autres Indiens Christianisez."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 165.

This author has also Métifs (ii. 10), and again: ". . . qu'ils appellent Metices, c'est à dire Metifs, meslez" (ii. 23).

"Le vy vne moustre generale de tous les Habitans portans armes, tant Portugais que Metices et Indiens, and se trouuerent environ 4000."—Moquet, 352.

c. 1665. "And, in a word Bengale is a country abounding in all things; and tis for this very reason that so many Portuguese, Mesticks, and other Christians are fled thither."—Bernier, E. T., 140.

Mutlub, s. Hind. from Ar. maṭ-lab. The Arabic, from ṭalab, 'he asked,' properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian use it always means 'purpose, gist,' and the like. Illiterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into matbal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, matbalī, 'opinionated,' and the like.

Mutt, Muth, s. Skt. maṭha; a sort of convent where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession; one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

1874. "The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree erratic and mendicant, but has anchorage places and headquarters in the maths."—Calc. Review, cxvii. 212.

Muttongye, s. Sea-Hind. matangai, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

Muttra, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jumna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Móδουρα ἢ τῶν Θεῶν. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under Madura.

Muxadabad, n.p. Arab. Pers. Maḳ-

ṣadābād, a name that often occurs in books of the last century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Murshidābād, the capital of the Nawābs of Bengal since the beginning of last century. The town Maḳ-ṣadābād is stated by Tiefenthaler to have been founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khan (also called in English histories Jafier Khan) moved the seat of government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muxadavad in the early English records down to 1760 (W. W. Hunter).

1703-4. "The first act of the Nuwab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Makhsoosabad to Moorshudabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace . . . to render it the capital of the Province."—Stewart, H. of Bengal, 309.

Munro* to his brother William, in Life, &c., iii. 41.

Muzbee, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low-caste, vulg. mazbī, apparently maḡhabī from Ar. maḡhab, 'religious belief.' Cunningham says indeed that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahommedanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now.

1858. "On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzzubees . . . The idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers."—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwardes to R. Montgomery, Esq., 23 of March.

Mydan, Meidaun, s. Hind. from Pers. maidān. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazza (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chaugān ground (see Chicane); a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or race-course.

c. 1330. "But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e. the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood. . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, 63.

1618. "When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade, and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business this is, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, i. 707.

1828. "All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the maidaun."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 223.

Myna, Mina, etc., s. Hind. mainā. A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn.; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Eulabes religiosa of Linn.; the Northern Hill-Myna, Eulabes intermedia of Hay (see Serdon's Birds, ed. 1877, ii. Pt. i. 325, 337, 339).

Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly's nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakeable truth.

There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An., xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shāmā, and under that head the quotation will be found.

1631. Jac. Bontius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pica, seu potius Sturnus Indicus. "The owner, an old Mussulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that her beloved bird should get no swine's flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis pessima immediately began to chaunt: Orang Nasarani catjor macan babi! i.e. 'Dog of a Christian, eater of swine!'"—Lib. v., cap. 14, p. 67.

1813. "The myneh is a very entertaining bird, hopping about the house, and articulating several words in the manner of the starling."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 47.

1817. "Of all birds the ching (miner) is the most highly prized."—Raffles's Java, i. 260.

1875. "A talking mina in a cage, and a rat-trap, completed the adornments of the veranda."—The Dilemma, ch. xii.

1878. "The myna has no wit . . . His only way of catching a worm is to lay hold of its tail and pull it out of its hole, generally breaking it in the middle and losing the bigger half."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 28.

1879. "So the dog went to a mainā, and said: 'What shall I do to hurt this cat?'"—Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 18.

Myrobalan, s. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of astringent flavour, but of several species, and not even all belonging to the same Natural Order, which were from an early date exported from India, and had a high reputation in the medieval pharmacopoeia. This they appear (some of them) to retain in native Indian medicine; though they seem to have disappeared from English use and have no place in Hanbury and Flückiger's great work the Pharmacographia. They are still, to some extent, imported into England, but for use in tanning and dyeing, not in pharmacy.

It is not quite clear how the term myrobalan, in this sense, came into use. For the people of India do not seem to have any single name denoting these fruits or drugs as a group, nor do the Arabic dictionaries afford one either (but see further on). Myrobalanos is spoken of by some ancient authors, e.g., Aristotle, Dioscorides and Pliny, but it was applied by them to one or more fruits* entirely unconnected with the subjects of this article. This name had probably been preserved in the laboratories, and was applied by some early translator of the Arabic writers on Materia Medica to these Indian products. Though we have said that (so far as we can discover) the Arabic dictionaries afford no word with the comprehensive sense of Myrobalan, it is probable that the physicians had such a word, and Garcia De Orta, who is trustworthy, says explicitly that the Arab practitioners whom he had consulted applied to the whole class the name delegi; a word which we cannot identify, unless it originated in a clerical error for alelegi, i.e. ihlilaj. This last word may perhaps be taken as covering all myrobalans; for according to the Glossary to Rhazes at Leyden (quoted by Dozy, Suppl. i. 43,) it applies to the Kabuli, the yellow, and the black (or Indian), whilst the Emblic is also called Ihlilaj amlaj.

In the Kashmir Customs Tariff (in Punjab Trade Report, ccxcvi.) we have entries of "Bulela (Myrobalan).

Bulela (Bellerick ditto).
Amla (Emblica Phyllanthus)."

The kinds recognized in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz. :—

(1) The Emblic myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anavula of Hind., the Emblica officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L., N. O. Euphorbiaceae). The Persian name of this is amlaḥ, but, as the Arabic amlaj suggests, probably in older Persian amlag, and hence no doubt Emblica. Garcia says it was called by the Arab physicians embelgi (which we should write ambalji).

(2) The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Bellerica, Roxb. (N.O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind. The Arabic name given in Ibn Baithar is bulḡij; in the old Latin version of Avicenna belilegi; and in Persian it is called batil and batila. Garcia says the Arab physicians called it beleregi (balirij, and in old Persian probably batirig) which accounts for Bellerica.

(3) The Chebule Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under Chebulee is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Ḥaltla-i-Kabuli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as calicoes got their name from Calicut. Garcia says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs quebulgi. Ibn Baithar calls them ḥaltij; and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kabuli.

(4), and (5). The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called 'Indian,' and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antiq. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37) were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognized, and nine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions.* One kind called Ṣini or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authorities of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobalans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Medieval Greek authors, referred to by Royle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobalan called Tryphera or Tryphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the triphalā ('Three-fruits') of

* This article we have been unable to find. Dr. Hunter in As. Researches (xi. 182) quotes from a Persian work of Mahommed Husain Shirāzi, communicated to him by Mr. Colebrooke, the names of 6 varieties of Ḥaltla (or Myrobalan) as afforded in different stages of maturity by the Terminalia Chebula.—1. H. Zira, when just set (from Zira, gummin-seed). 2. H. Javet (from Jao, barley). 3. Zangt or Hind (The Black M.). 4. H. Chini. 5. H. Asfar, or Yellow. 6. H. Kabuli, the mature fruit.

Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royle, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebolic; but Garcia, who calls it tinepala (tin-plul in Hind.= 'Three-fruits') seems to imply that it consisted of the three kinds known in Goa, viz., citrine (or yellow), the Indian (or black), and the belleric. The emblic, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumach.

The Myrobalsans imported in the middle ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup?).

c. 540. A prescription of Actius of Amida, which will be found transcribed under Zedoary, includes myrobalan among a large number of ingredients, chiefly of Oriental origin; and one doubts whether the word may not here be used in the later sense.

c. 1343. "Preserved Mirabolans (mirabolani conditi) should be big and black, and the envelope over the nut tender to the tooth; and the bigger and blacker and tenderer to the tooth (like candied walnuts) the better they are. . . . Some people say that in India they are candied when unripe (acerbe), just as we candy* the unripe tender walnuts, and that when they are candied in this way they have no nut within, but are all through tender like our walnut-comfits. But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. They should be kept in brown earthen pots glazed, in a syrup made of cassia fistula† and honey or sugar; and they should remain always in the syrup, for they form a moist preserve and are not fit to use dry."—Pegolotti, p. 377.

† This is surely not what we now call Cassia Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, affording a mild laxative? But Hanbury and Fluckiger (pp. 195, 475) show that some (Cassia bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as καρδία συγγυγάνης and cassia fistularis; whilst the drug now called Cassia Fistula, L. is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantinople towards A.D. 1300. Pegolotti, at p. 306, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of cassia fistula: "It ought to be black, and thick, and unbroken (saida), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside rind is, the riper and better it is; and it retains its virtue well for 2 years." This is not very decisive, but on the whole we should suppose Pegolotti's cassia fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid twigs of a like plant (see H. & F. 470).

* This is probably Balanitis aegyptiaca, Delile, the zok of the Arabs, which is not unlike myrobalan fruit, and yields an oil much used medicinally. The Negroes of the Niger make an intoxicating spirit of it.

Mysore, n. p. The city which was the capital of the Hindoo kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar dynasty. (See Bisnagar and Narsinga).

C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Maissi-ūr, Maissi being the name of a local goddess like Pomona or Flora; ūr=town or village. It is however usually said to be a corruption of Mahish-āsura, the buffalo-demon slain by the goddess Durgā or Kālī.

Mysore Thorn. The Caesalpinia sepiarita, Roxb. It is armed with short, sharp, recurved prickles; and is much used as a fence in the Deccan. Hyder Ali planted it round his strongholds in Mysore.

N.

Nabób, s. Port. Nabábo, and Fr. Nabab, from Hind. Nawāb, which is the Arab pl. of sing. Nayab, 'a deputy,' and was applied in a singular sense* to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz., a Viceroy or Chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e. g. the Nawāb of Surat, the Nawāb of Oudh, the Nawāb of Arcot, the Nawāb Názim of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahommedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Rāi and Rājā are upon Hindus. Nabob is used in two ways.

(a) Simply as a corruption and representative of Nawāb. We got it direct from the Port. nabábo, see quotation from Bluteau below.

(b) It began to be applied in the last century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Nabob' (Nabob) (1768), aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

1787. "The speakers for him (Hastings) were Burgess, who has completely done for himself in one day; Nichols, a lawyer; Mr. Vansittart, a nabob; Alderman Le Mesurier, a smuggler from Jersey; . . . and Dempster, who is one of the good-natured candid men who connect themselves with every bad man they can find."—*Ld. It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense miswritten Nawab; thus:

1878. "These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr. John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878. "If . . . the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our aid of their friends the Turks would have taken the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levies to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashi-Bozouks, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of * Qu. boroughs? The writer does injustice to his country when he speaks of burghs being bought and sold. The representation of Scotch burghs before 1832 was bad, but it never was purchasable. There are no burghs in England.

King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11th, p. 470.

In this passage, in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob = Naboth, and Naboth = Uriah.

Nacoda, Nacoder, &c., s. Pers. nā-khudā (navis dominus) 'a skipper'; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo). It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this "a Malay word . . . derived from the Persian," especially considering that he is dealing with a book of the 9th and 10th centuries.

c. 916. "Bientôt l'on ne garda pas même de ménagements pour les patrons de navires (navākhuda, pl. of nākhudā) Arabes, et les matres de batiments marchands furent en butte à des pretentions injustes."—Relation, &c., i. 68.

c. 1348. 1502. "But having been seen by our fleet, the caravels made for them, and the Moors being laden could no longer escape. So they brought them to the Captain General, and all struck sail, and from six of the Zambucos the nacodas came to the Captain General."—Correa, i. 302.

1738. "Our Chocardia (?) assured us they were rogues; but our Knockaty or pilot told us he knew them. . . ."—Ives, 248.

This word looks like a confusion, in the manner of the Poet of the "Snark," between nākhudā and (Hind.) arkātī, "a pilot."

1880. "That a pamphlet should be printed, illustrated by diagrams, and widely circulated, commends itself to the Government of India . . . copies being supplied to Nakhudas and tindals of native craft at small cost."—Resn. of Govt. of India as to Lights for Shipping, 28th Jan.

Naga, n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilised clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachār and the basin of the Surma. A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Naga clans is still independent.

The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Naga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and the sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. nagna, Hind. nangā, Beng. nengā, &c.), which, curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shihābuddin also indicates.

c. 1662. "The Rājah had first intended to fly to the Nāgā Hills, but from fear of our army the Nāgās* would not afford him an asylum. 'The Nāgās live in the southern mountains of Asām, have a light brown complexion, are well built, but treacherous. In number they equal the helpers of Yagor and Magor, and resemble in hardness and physical strength the 'A'dis (an ancient Arabian tribe). They go about naked like beasts. . . . Some of their chiefs came to see the Nawāb. They wore dark hip-clothes (lung), ornamented with cowries, and round about their heads they wore a belt of boar's tusks, allowing their black hair to hang down their neck.'"—Shihāb-uddin Tālish, tr. by Prof. Blochmann, in *J. 1682. "Before the expiration of this time we were overtaken by ye Caddie's Neip, ye Meerbar's deputy, and ye Dutch Director's Vukill, (by the way it's observable ye Dutch omit no opportunity to do us all the prejudice that lyes in their power)."—Hedges, Oct. 11.

1765. "... this person was appointed Niab, or deputy governor of Orissa."—Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 53.

Naik, Naique, &c. s. Hind. nāyāk. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. nāyaka, 'a leader, chief, general.' The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour used among Hindūs in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

It may be added that Nāyar was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nāyar and Nāyaka are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see Garcia, 85v).

1727. "The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both."—A. Ham. i. 312.

Nankeen, s. A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from China, and derived its name from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was however imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China.

Nankeen appears to be known in Central Asian markets under the modified name of nanka (see below).

1793-4. "The land in this neighbourhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe . . . in that growing in the province of Kiangnan, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth."—Stanton's Narr. of Lord Macartney's Embassy, ii. 425.

1794-5. "The colour of Nam-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade . . . The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Nam-King of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler."—Van Braam's Embassy, E. 1848. "'Don't be trying to deprecate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss,' Mr. Hamnerdown said; 'let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to nature, the gentleman in a nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a banyhann tree and a pagody.'"—Vanity Fair, i. 178.

Nanking, n.p. The great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtsekiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or 'South Court.' Peking ('North-Court') was however reoccupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since.

Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chelim) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Conti (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor: "Hinc prope XV. dierum itinerare (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking) alia civitas Nemptai nomine, ab imperatore condita, cujus ambitus patet triginta miliaribus, caque est populosissima omnium." This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix's translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemnai. The form Lankin, &c. is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fuhkien form.

c. 1520. "After that follows Great China, the king of which is the greatest sovereign in the world. . . . The port of this kingdom is called Guantan, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Com-

c. 1540. "Thereunto we answered that we were strangers, natives of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the Port of Liampo to go to the fishing of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea . . . that we purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rowers in the first Lantea that should put to sea, for to pass unto Cantan. . . ."—Pinto, E. T., p. 99, (orig. cap. xxxi.)

1553. "Further, according to the Cosmographies of China . . . the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run therefrom in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanquij, Xantom (Shantung), and Quincij' (Kingsze or capital, i.e., Pecheli).—Barros, I., ix. 1.

1556. "Ogni anno va di Persia alla China vna grossa Carauana, che camina sei mesi prima ch'arriui alla Città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus, iii. 391r.

Narcondam, n.p. The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narkandam one cannot but recognize Narak, 'Hell'; perhaps Naraka-kundam, 'a pit of hell'; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognized in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group" of the Andamans? But we have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitous encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell,' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. The latter name is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Ilha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 ft. high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E. I. Pilot or Oriental Navigator (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese," in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam, or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Ilha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are, of Narcondam, N. lat. 13° 24', E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 16', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (18 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E. I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island," and "Ayconda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded.

1598. "... as you put off from the Landes of Andeman towards the Coast... there lyeth onely in the middle way an Ilande, which the inhabitants call Viacondam, which is a small Iland having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linschoten, 328.

Nard, s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Jutamansi, D.C., a native of the loftier Himālaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nalada through Semitic media, whence the change of l into r; and in this form it is found in both Hebrew and Greek. The plant was first identified in modern times by Sir W.

Jones. See in Canticles, i. 12, and iv. 13, 14.

C. A.D. 90. "Κατάγεται δὲ δι' αὐτῆς (Οξνῆς) καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἄνω τόπων, ἡ διὰ Πωκλαίδος καταφερομένη νόβρους, ἡ Κασπατυρηνή, καὶ ἡ Παροπατισσινή, καὶ ἡ Καβολίτη, καὶ ἡ διὰ τῆς παρακειμένης Σκυθίας."—Periplus, § 48 (corrected by Fabricius).

C. A.D. 545. "... also to Sindu, where you get the musk or castorin, and androstachyn" (for nardostachys, i. e., spike-nard).—Cosmas in Cathay, p. clxxviii.

1563. "I know no other spikenard (espique-nardo) in this country, except what I have already told you, that which comes from Chitor and Mandou, regions on the confines of Deli, Bengala, and the Decan."—Garcia, f. 191.

1790. "We may on the whole be assured that the nardus of Ptolemy, the Indian Sumbul of the Persians and Arabs, the Jatdminsi of the Hindus, and the spike-nard of our shops are one and the same plant."—Sir W. Jones, in As. Res., ii. 410.

c. 1781.

"My first shuts out thieves from your house or your room,
My second expresses a Syrian perfume;
My whole is a man in whose converse is shared
The strength of a Bar and the sweetness of Nard."

Charade on Bishop Barnard by Dr. Johnson.

Nargeela, Nargileh, s. Properly the coco-nut (Skt. nārikera, -kela, or -keli; Pers. nārgil; Greek of Cosmas, Ἀργέλλιον); thence the hubble-bubble or hooka in its simplest form, as made from a coco-nut shell; and thence again, in Pers., a hooka or water-pipe with a glass or metal vase.

Narsinga, n.p. This is the nr most frequently applied in the 4th and 17th centuries to the kin Southern India otherwise termed Vijayanagara or Bisnagar (q. v.), the latest powerful Hindu kingdom in the Peninsula. This kingdom was founded on the ruins of the Belāla dynasty reigning at Dvāra Samudra, about A.D. 1341. The original dynasty of Vijayanagara became extinct about 1487, and was replaced by Narasiṅha, a prince of Telugu origin, who reigned till 1508. He was therefore reigning at the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, and the name of Narsinga, which they learned to apply to this kingdom from his name, continued to be applied to it for nearly two centuries.

1510. "The Governor . . . learning of the embassy which the King of Bisnaga was sending to Cananore to the Viceroy, to offer firm friendship, he was most desirous to make alliance and secure peace . . . principally because the kingdom of Narsinga extends in the interior from above Calcutt and from the Balagate as far as Cambaya, and thus if we had any wars in those countries by sea, we might by land have the most valuable aid from the King of Bisnaga."—Correa, ii. 30.

1513. "Aderant tunc apud nostrū prae-fectū a Narsingae rege legati."—Emanuel. Reg. Epist., f. 3v.

1516. "45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very large city which is called Bijanaguer, very populous . . . The King of Narsinga always resides there."—Barbosa, 85.

c. 1538. "And she (the Queen of Onor) swore to him by the golden sandals of her pagod that she would rejoice as much should God give him the victory over them (the Turks) as if the King of Narsinga, whose slave she was, should place her at table with his wife."—F. Mendez Pinto, ch. ix., see also Cogan, p. 11.

1553. "And they had learned besides from a Friar who had come from Narsinga to stay at Cananor, how that the King of Narsinga, who was as it were an Emperor of the Gentiles of India in state and riches, was appointing ambassadors to send him . . ."—Barros, I. viii. 9.

O Reyno Narsinga poderoso Mais de ouro e de pedras, que de forte gente." Camões, vii. 21.

By Burton:
"Narsinga's Kingdom, with her rich display Of gold and gems, but poor in martial vein. . . ."

1580. "In the Kingdom of Narsingua to this day, the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands; all other wives are burnt at their husbands' funerals."—Montaigne, by Cotton, ch. xi.

(What is said here of priests applies to Lingayats, q. v.)

1611. " . . . the Dutch President on the coast of Choromandell, shewed us a Caul (see Cowle) from the King of Narsinga, Wencapati, Raia, wherein was granted that it should not be lawfull for any one that came out of Europe to trade there, but such as brought Prince Maurice his Patent, and therefore desired our departure."—P. W. Floris, in Purchas, i. 320.

1681. "Coromandel. Ciudad muy grande, sujeta al Rey de Narsinga, el qual Reyno e llamado por otro nombre Bisnaga."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 16.

Nassick, n.p. Nāsik; Nāsika of Ptolemy (vii. i. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavery R., and the head-quarter of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog. Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (now Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India.

Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1857), have been called by him Nāsik squares, and Nāsik cubes, from his residence at that ancient place (see Encyc. Britan. 9th ed. xv. 215).

Nat, s. Burmese nāt; a term applied to all spiritual beings, angels, elfs, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

Nautch, s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ball. Hind. and Mahr. nāch; from Skt. nr̥itya, dancing or stage-playing, through Prakrit nachcha. The word is in European use all over India.

Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly.

In the first of the quotations below he calls Fiffine the 'European nautch,' which is like calling some Hindu dancing-girl 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

1823. "I joined Lady Macnaghten and a large party this evening to go to a nâch given by a rich native, Roupall Mullich, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, i. 37, ed. 1844.

c. 1831. "Elle (Begum Sumrou) fit enterrer vivante une jeune esclave, dont elle était jalouse, et donna à son mari un nautch (bal) sur cette horrible tombe."—Jacquemont, Correspondance, ii. 221.

" . . . let be there was no worst Of degradation spared Fiffine; ordained from first To last, in body and soul, for one lifelong debauch
The Pariah of the North, the European Nautch!" Fyfine at the Fair, 31.

1876.
" . . . I locked in the swarth little lady—
I swear,
From the head to the foot of her,—well quite as bare!
'No Nautch shall cheat me,' said I,
taking my stand
At this bolt which I draw. . . ."
Natural Magic, in Puchiarotto, etc.

Nautch-girl, s. See Bayadère, Dancing-girl. The second quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

1825. "The Nâch women were, as usual, ugly, huddled up in huge bundles of red petticoats; and their exhibition as dull and insipid to an European taste, as could well be conceived."—Heber, ii. 102.

1836. "In India and the East dancing-girls are trained called Almeh, and they give a fascinating entertainment called a natch, for which they are well paid."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 322.

Navait, Naitea, Nevoyat, &c. A name given to Mahomedans of mixt race in the Konkani and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Moplas (q.v.) and Lubbyes (see under that word) of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. navā, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.'

1552. "Sons of Moors and of Gentile women, who are called Neiteas . . ."—Castanheda, iii. 24.

1553. "Naiteas que são mestiços: quanto aos padres de geração dos Arabios . . . e per parte das madres das Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. iii.

„ "And because of this fertility of soil, and of the trade of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Naiteas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan . . ."—Barros, i. viii. 9.

c. 1612. "From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowayits (literally the New Race) . . ."—Firishta, by Briggs, iv. 533.

1626. "There are two sorts of Moors, one Mesticos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethniko-mothers, called Naiteani, Mungrels also in their religion, the other Forreiners . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

Nazir, s. Hind. from Arab. nāzīr, 'inspector' (naẓr, sight). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered 'sheriff,' because he serves processes, &c.

1670. "The Khan . . . ordered his Nassir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants . . ."—Andriess, 41.

1788. "The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 204.

Neel, s. See Anil.

Neelām, Leelām, s. Hind. nīlām, from Port. leilão. An auction, or public "outcry," as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch roup; comp. German rufen, and outroop of Linschoten's translator below). The word, however, is oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Arab. īlām (al-īlām), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1598. "In Goa there is holden a daylie assemble . . . which is like the meeting upō the burse in Andwarpe . . . and there are all kindes of Indian commodities to sell so that in a manner it is like a Faire . . . it beginneth in y<sup>e</sup> morning at 7 o'clock, and continueth till 9 . . ."

principal streete of the citie . . . and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroop . . . and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought thether and sold to the last pennieworth. in the same outroop, whosoever they be, yea although they were the Viceroyes goodes . . .”—Linschoten, ch. xxix.

c. 1610. “. . . le mary vient frapper à la porte, dont la femme faisant fort l'estonnee, prie le Portugais de se cacher dans vne petite cuue à porcelaine, et l'ayant fait entrer là dedans, et ferme tres bien à clef, ouurit la porte a son mary, qui . . . le laissa tremper là jusqu'au lendemain matin, qu'il fit porter ceste cuue au marché, ou lailan ainsi qu'ils appellent . . .”—Mocquet, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: “O Leilao que se faz cada dia pola menha na Rua direita de Goa.”

The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form ye-lang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form le-lang and Swatow loy-lang (see Giles; also Dennys's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

Neelgye, Nilghau, &c., s. Hind. nilgau, nilgāi, lilgāi, i.e. ‘blue cow’; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antilope tragocamelus (Portax pictus, of Jerdon), given from the slaty blue which is its predominating colour. The proper Hindi name of the animal is rājā (Skt. riśya or riśhya).

1663. “After these Elephants are brought divers tamed Gazelles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Nilgaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elands, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffalos of Bengala . . . to combat with a Lion or Tiger.”—Bernier, E. T., p. 84.

1824. “There are not only neelghaus, and the common Indian deer, but some noble red-deer in the park” (at Lucknow).—Heber (ed. 1844), i. 214.

1882. “All officers, we believe, who have served, like the present writers, on the canals of Upper India, look back on their peripatetic life there as a happy time . . . occasionally on a winding part of the bank one intruded on the solitude of a huge nilgai.”—Mem. of General Sir W. E. Baker, p. 11.

Neem, s. The Tree (Ord. Meliaceae) Azadirachta indica, Jussieu; Hind. nīm (and nib, according to Playfair, Chief Shereef, 170), Mahr. nimb, from mā nimba. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a repute for various remedial uses. Thus poultices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bakain (see buckyne), on which it grafts readily.

1563. “R. I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it.

“O. You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great repute as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with, and the name among them all is nimbo. I came to know its virtues in the Balaghat, because with it I there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal; and these sores were cleaned very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entirely with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixt with lemon-juice . . .”—Garcia, f. 153.

1578. “There is another tree highly medicinal . . . which is called Nimbo; and the Malabars call it Bepole.”—Acosta, 284.

1877. “The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints.”—Macdowds Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

Negapatam, n.p. A seaport of Tanjore District in S. India, written Nāgai-ppattānam, which may mean ‘Snake Town.’ It is, perhaps, the Nīyama Μητρόπολις of Ptolemy; and see under Coromandel.

Negombo, n.p. A pleasant town and old Dutch fort nearly 20 miles north of Colombo in Ceylon; formerly famous for the growth of the best cinnamon. The etymology is given in very different ways. We read recently that the name is properly (Tamil) Nir-Kolumbu, i.e. ‘Columbo in the water.’ But according to Emerson Tennent the ordinary derivation is Mi-gamoa, the ‘Village of bees;’ whilst Burnouf says it is properly Nāga-bhu, ‘Land of Nagas’ or serpent worshippers (see Tennent, ii. 630).

1613. “On this he cast anchor; but the wind blowing very strong by daybreak, the ships were obliged to weigh, as they could not stand at their moorings. The vessel of Andrea Coelho and that of Nuno Alvares Teixeira, after weighing, not being able to weather the reef of Negumbo, ran into the bay, where the storm compelled them to be beached; but as there were plenty of people there, the vessels were run up by hand and not wrecked."—Bocarro, 42.

Negraís, Cape, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan.* The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of a native name which the Burmese express as Naga-rít, 'Dragon's whirlpool.' The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old time by some name like Nāgarāshtra. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilized people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Baranagār. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negraís, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negraís, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224—228).

1553. "Up to the Cape of Negraís, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1583. "Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the N.E., and running our course till morning we found ourselves close to the Bar of Negraís, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 92.

1586. "We entered the barre of Negraís, which is a braue barre," etc. (See under Cosmin).—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 390.

1727. "The Sea Coast of Arackan reaches from Xatigam to Cape Negraís, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited . . ." (after speaking of "the great Island of Negraís") . . . he goes on . . . "The other Island of Negraís, which makes the Point called the Cape . . . is often called Diamond Island, because its Shape is a Rhombus . . . Three Leagues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long . . . conspicuous at all Times by the Sea breaking over them . . . the Rocks are called the Legarti, or in English, the Lizard."—A. Ham. ii. 29-30.

This reef is the Alguada, on which a noble lighthouse was erected by Capt. (now Lieut.-Gen.) A. Fraser, C.B. of the Engineers, with great labour and skill. The statement of Hamilton suggests that the original name may have been Lagarto. But Alagada, 'overflowed,' is the real origin. It appears in the old French chart of d'Après as Ile Noyée. In Dunn it is Negada, or Neijada, or Lequado, or Sunken Island (N. Dir. 1780, 325).

1759. "The Dutch by an Inscription in Teutonic Characters, lately found at Negraís, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (qu. if not 1627?), appear then to have had Possession of that Island."—Letter in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 98.

Nelly, Nele, s. Malayāl. nel, 'rice in the husk.' This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1606. ". . . when they sell nele, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two grains for himself for luck (com superstição), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 52 b.

1651. "Nili, that is, unpounded rice, which is still in the husk."—Rogierius, p. 95.

Nellore, n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil Nall-ūr, 'Good Town.' But the local interpretation is from nel (see preceding article); and in the local records it is given in Sanskrit as Dhānya-puram, meaning 'rice-town' (Seshagiri Sāstri).

c. 1310. "Ma'bar extends in length from Kūlam to Nilāwar, nearly 300 parasangs along the sea coast."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

Nerbudda R., n.p. Skt. Narmadā, 'causing delight'; Ptol. Nápadōs; Peripl. Λαμναίος (amended by Fabricius to Námpados). Dean Vincent's conjectured etymology of Nahr-Buddā,

'River of Buddha,' is a caution against such guesses.

c. 1020. "From Dhár southwards to the R. Nerbadda nine (parasangs); thence to Mahrat-des . . . eighteen . . ."—Al-Birûni, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerbadda is however doubtful.

c. 1310. "There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerbadda was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge."—Amir Khusrû, in Elliot, 79.

Nercha, s. Malm. Nerchcha, 'a vow,' from verb neruya, 'to agree or promise.'

1606. "They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together . . . and this they call nercha."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 63. See also f. 11.

This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindoos a common form is to feed a lamp before an idol with glue instead of oil.

Nerrick, Nerruck, Nirk, &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirakh. A tariff, rate, or price current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1799. "I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrick of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of shroffing . . ."—Wellington, i. 56.

1800. "While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrick of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris . . . and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras."—Id. i. 67.

1878. "On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar 'nerik' or market-rate, had so risen."—Life in the Mofussil, i. p. 33.

Ngapee, s. The Burmese name, nga-pi ('pressed fish'), of the odoriferous delicacy described under Balachong, q. v.

1855. "Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngapè at Amara-poorâ exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubère mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese."—Mission to Ava, p. 160.

Nicobar Islands, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the Bâpovosai of Ptolemy, and the Lankha Bâlus of the oldest Arab Relation. The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of last century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the Voyage of the Novara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement.

Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nakka-vâram, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (nañgā).

c. 1050. The name appears as Nakka-vâram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century.

c. 1292. "When you leave the island of Java (the Less) and the Kingdom of Lambri, you sail north about 150 miles, and then you come to two islands, one of which is called Necuveran. In this island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 12.

c. 1300. "Opposite Lâmrî is the island of Lâkwâram (probably to read Nakwâram), which produces plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover the pudenda with cocoanut leaves. They are all subject to the Kâân."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1322. "Departing from that country, and sailing towards the south over the Ocean Sea, I found many islands and countries, where among others was one called Nicoveran . . . both the men and women there have faces like dogs, etc. . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 97.

1510. "In front of the before named island of Samatra, across the Gulf of the Ganges, are 5 or 6 small islands, which have very good water and ports for ships. They are inhabited by Gentiles, poor people, and are called Niconvar (Nacabar in Lisbon ed.), and they find in them very good amber, which they carry thence to Malacca and other parts."—Barbosa, 195.

1514. "Seeing the land, the pilot said it was the land of Nicubar . . . The pilot was at the top to look out, and coming down he said that this land was all cut up (i.e. in islands), and that it was possible to pass through the middle; and that now there was no help for it but to chance it or turn back to Cochîn . . . The natives of the country had sight of us and suddenly came forth in great boats full of people . . . They were all Caffres, with fish-bones inserted in their lips and chin: big men and frightful to look on; having their boats full of bows and arrows poisoned with herbs."—Civ. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. pp. 71-72.

Nigger, s. It is an old brutality of the Englishman in India to apply this term to the natives, as we may see from Ives quoted below. The use originated, however, doubtless in following the old Portuguese use of negros for "the blacks" (q.v.) with no malice prepenze, without any intended confusion between Africans and Asiatics.

1548. "Moreover three blacks (negros) in this territory occupy lands worth 3000 or 4000 pardaos of rent; they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts."—S. Botelho, Cartas, 111.

1582. "A nigroe of John Cambayes, Pilot to Paulo de la Gama, was that day run away to the Moores."—Castañeda, by N. L., f. 19.

1622. Ed. Grant, purser of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoor of negers, which was deviled bytwick the Duch and the English."—Sainsbury, iii. p. 78.

c. 1755. "You cannot affront them (the natives) more than to call them by the name of negroe, as they conceive it implies an idea of slavery."—Ives, Voyage, p. 23.

c. 1757. "Gli Gesuiti sono missionarii e parrochi de' negri detti Malabar."—Della Tomba, 3.

1760. "The Dress of this Country is entirely linnen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned Hides as in England . . . only that they are rfo thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negroes, and sold for about 10d. a Pr. each of which will last two months with care."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, Sept. 30th.

1866. "Now the political creed of the frequenters of dawk bungalows is too uniform . . . it consists in the following tenets . . . that Sir Mordaunt Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you."—The Dawk Bungalow, p. 225.

Nilgherry, Neilgherry, &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the south end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malai-nādu, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill-sanitaria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nīlagiri, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nīla or Nīladri (synonymous with Nīlagiri) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Hindu Puranic Cosmography (see Vishnu Purāna in Wilson's works by Hall, vol. ii. pp. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range, about 1820, by some European. Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

"One of the English ships was called the Nellegree, the name taken from the Nellegree Hills in Bengal, as I have heard."—Dampier, ii. 145.

1683. "In y<sup>e</sup> morning early I went up the Nilagree Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley."—Hedges, March 2d.

Nipa, s. a. The name of a stemless palm (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastwards, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. "In the Philippines," says Crawford, "but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the Nipa . . . is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government" (Desc. Dict. p. 301). But this fact is almost enough in itself to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

b. Arrack made from the sap of a palm-tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The Portuguese, appropriating the word Nipa to this spirit, called the tree itself nipeira.

1611. "Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called Nipa (growing in watery places), and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tanasarim, Malaca, and the Philippines or Manila; but that of Tanasarim exceeds all in goodness."—Teixeira, Relações, i. 17.

1848. "Steaming amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunds . . . the paddles of the steamer tossed up the large fruits of the Nipa fruticans, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey."—Hooker, Himalayan Journal, i. 1-2.

1860. "The Nipa is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar."—Mason's Burmah, p. 506.

1874. "It (sugar) is also got from Nipa fruticans, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-regions, extensively cultivated in Tavoy."—Hanbury and Flüchiger, 655.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the Nipa spirit.

1568. "Nipa, qual' è vn Vino eccellentissimo che nasce nel fior d'vn arbore chiamato Niper, il cui liquor si distilla, e se ne fa vna beuanda eccellentissima."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus. iii. 392 v.

c. 1567. "Euery yeere is there lade (at Tenasserim) some ships with Verzino. Nipa, and Benjamin."—Ibid. (E. T. in Hakluyt), ii. 359.

1591. "Those of Tanasari are chiefly freighted with Rice and Nipar wine, which is very strong."—Barker's Account of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hak. ii. 592.

In the next two quotations nipe is confounded with coco-nut spirit.

1598. "Likewise there is much wine brought thither, which is made of Cocus or Indian Nattes, and is called Nype de Tanasaria, that is Aqua-Composita of Tanasaria."—Linschoten, 30.

"The Sura, being distilled, is called Fula (see Fool-rack) or Nipe, and is an excellent Aqua Vitæ as any is made in Dort."—Id. 101.

1623. "In the daytime they did nothing but talk a little with one another, and some of them get drunk upon a certain wine they have of raisins, or on a kind of aqua vitæ with other things mixt in it, in India called nippa, which had been given them."—P. della Valle, ii. 669.

We think there can be little doubt that the slang word nip for a small dram of spirits is adopted from Nipa.

Nirvāna, s. Sansk. nīrvāṇa. The literal meaning of this word is simply 'blown out,' like a candle. It is the technical term in the philosophy of the Buddhists for the condition to which they aspire as the crown and goal of virtue, viz., the cessation of sentient existence. On the exact meaning of the term see Childers's Pali Dictionary, s.v. nibbāna, an article from which we quote a few sentences below, but which covers ten double-column pages.

The word has become common in Europe along with the growing interest in Buddhism, and partly from its use by Schopenhauer. But it is often employed very inaccurately, of which an instance occurs in the quotation below from Dr. Draper.

The oldest European occurrence of which we are aware is in Purchas, who had met with the Pali form common in Burma, &c., niḥḥāna.

1626. "After death they (the Talapoys) beleeve three Places, one of Pleasure Seium (perhaps sukham) like the Mahumitane Paradise; another of Torment Naxac (read Narac); the third of Annihilation which they call Niba."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 506.

c. 1815. "... the state of Niban, which is the most perfect of all states. This consists in an almost perpetual extacy, in which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Sangermano, Burmese Empire, p. 6.

1858. "... Transience, Pain, and Unreality . . . these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is exemption from these in the attainment of nirvāna, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, absolute nothingness; or whether it be, as Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the ubi or the modus in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognisant of."—Mission to Ava, 236.

"When from between the sāl trees at Kusināra he passed into nirvāna, he (Buddha) ceased, as the extinguished fire ceases."—Ibid. 239.

1869. "What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular view of the Nirvāna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul into itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvāna suggests rather a kind of Mohammedan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Lecture on Buddhist Nihilism, in Trübner's Or. Record, Oct. 16, 1869.

1875. "Nibbānam. Extinction; destruction; annihilation; annihilation of being, Nirvāna; annihilation of human passion, Arhatship or final sanctification . . . . .

"In Trübner's Record for July, 1870, I first propounded a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvāna is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhatship ends."—Childers, Pali Dictionary, pp. 265-266.

"But at length reunion with the universal intellect takes place; Nirwana is reached, oblivion is attained . . . the state in which we were before we were born."—Draper, Conflict, &c., 122.

"And how—in fulness of the times—it fell

That Buddha died . . . . .

And how a thousand thousand crores since then

Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvāna where the Silence lives."

Nokar, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants.' Hind. naukar, from Pers., and naukar-lōg. Also naukar-chākar, 'the servants,' one of those jingling double-barrelled phrases in which Orientals delight even more than Englishmen. As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, mighty-tighty, higgledy-piggledy, hocus-pocus, tit for tat, topsy-turvy, harum-scarum, roly-poly, fiddle-faddle, rump and stump, slip-slop. In this case chākar (see chacker) is also Persian. Naukar would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz (see below).

c. 1407. "L'Emir Khodaidad fit partir avec ce député son serviteur (naukar) et celui de Mirza Djihanghir. Ces trois personnalités joignent la cour auguste. . . ."—Abdurrazzāk in Notices et Extraits, XIV. i. 146.

c. 1660. "Mahmūd Sultān . . understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his 'naukars' (apparently armed followers)."—Abulghāzi, by Desmaisons; 271.

1840. "Noker, 'the servant;' this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chenghiz Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration."—Hammer, Golden Horde, 460.

Non-regulation, adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department), in which the ordinary Laws (or Regulations, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable.

The original theory of administration in such provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the hands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between Regulation and Non-regulation Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:—"La Non-intervention est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin à-peu-près la même chose que l'Intervention."

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie's visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: "It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be Non-regulation."

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a Non-regulation Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1860. "... Nowe what ye ffolke of Bengala worschyppen Sir Jhone discourseth lityl. This mochwewee gadere. Some worschyppin ane Idole yclept Agularionn and some worschyppen Non-regulation (veluti Cogit Flagit). . . .”—Ext. from a MS. of The Travels of Sir John Mandevill in the E. Indies, lately discovered.

1867. “. . . We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicily wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great measure as a ‘non-regulation province.’”—Quarterly Review, Jan. 1867, p. 135.

1883. ‘The Delhi district, happily for all, was a non-regulation province.’—Life of Lord Lawrence, i. 44.

Nor-wester, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a ‘dust storm’ at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. See Tufaan.

1810. “. . . those violent squalls called ‘north-westers,’ in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter. . . . The force of these north-westers is next to incredible.”—Williamson, V. M., ii. 35.

Nowbehār, n. p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus, in the early history of the Mahomedans in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Nau-vihār (Nava-vihāra, ‘New Monastery’). And the same name occurs at Balkh, near the Oxus.

Nowroze, s. Pers. nau-rōz, ‘New (Year’s) Day;’ i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees.

c. 1590. “This was also the cause why the Naurūz i Jalālī was observed, on which day, since his Majesty’s accession, a great feast was given. . . . The New Year’s Day feast . . . commences on the day when the Sun in his splendour moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Farwardin).”—Ain, 183 and 276.

1638. “There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies; one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Naurus, Nauros, or Norose, which signifies nine dayes, though now it lasts eighteen at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries.”—Mandelslo, 41.

1673. “On the day of the Vernal Equinox, we returned to Gombroon, when the Moors introduced their New-Year Æde, or Noe Rose, with Banqueting and great Solemnity.”—Fryer, 306.

Persis hæreditate accepta festività, omnium caeterarum maxima et sollemnissima.”—Kaempfer, Am. Exot. 162.

1815. “Jemsheed also introduced the solar year; and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Nauroze, or new year’s day, and is still the great festival in Persia.”—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 17.

1832. “Now-roz (new year’s day) is a festival or eed of no mean importance in the estimation of Mussulman society. . . . The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days’ previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for now-roz.”—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Obsns. on the Mussulmans of India, i. 283-4.

c. 1300. We find this word in a medieval list of articles of trade contained in Capmany’s Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App. 74) under the form noxadre.

1343. “Salarmoniac, cioè lisciadro, e non si dà nè sacco nè cassa con essa.”—Pegolotti, p. 17; also see 57, etc.

Nuddeea Rivers, n. p. See under Hoogly River, of which these are branches, intersecting the Nadiya District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Ganges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.

Nuggurcote, n. p. Nagarkoṭ. This is the form used in olden times, and even now not obsolete, for the name of the ancient fortress in the Punjab Himālaya which we now usually know as Koṭ-kāngra, both being substantially the same name, Nagarkoṭ, ‘The fortress town,’ or Koṭ-kā-nagara, ‘The town of the fortress.’ In yet older times, and in the history of Mahmūd of Ghazni, it is styled Bhīm-nagar. The name Nagarkoṭ is sometimes used by older European writers to designate the Himalayan mountains.

1008. “The Sultan himself (Mahmūd) joined in the pursuit, and went after them as far as the fort called Bhīm-nagar, which is very strong, situated on the promontory of a lofty hill, in the midst of impassable waters."—Al-Ubbi, in Elliot, i. 34.

1337. "When the sun was in Cancer, the King of the time (Mahommed Tughlak) took the stone fort of Nagarkot in the year 738. . . . It is placed between rivers like the pupil of an eye . . . and is so impregnable that neither Sikandar nor Dara were able to take it."—Badr-i-chach in Elliot, iii. 570.

c. 1370. "Sultan Firoz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot, and passing by the valleys of Nakhach-nuhgarhi, he arrived with his army at Nagarkot, which he found to be very strong and secure. . . . The idol Jwalamukhi (see Jowaula mookhee), much worshipped by the infidels, was situated in the road to Nagarkot. . . ."—Shams-i-Siraj, in Elliot, iii. 317-318.

1398. "When I entered the valley on that side of the Siwalik, information was brought to me about the town of Nagarkot, which is a large and important town of Hindustan, and situated in these mountains. The distance was 30 kos, but the road lay through jungles, and over lofty and rugged hills."—Autobiog. of Timur, in do., 465.

1553. "But the sources of those rivers (Indus and Ganges) though they burst forth separately in the mountains which Ptolemy calls Imaus, and which the natives call Dalanguer and Nangracot, yet are these mountains so closely joined that it seems as if they sought to hide those springs."—Barros, i. iv. 7.

c. 1590. "Nagerkote is a city situated upon a mountain, with a fort called Kangerah. In the vicinity of this city, upon a lofty mountain, is a place called Mahamaye, which they consider as one of the works of the Divinity, and come in pilgrimage to it from great distances, thereby obtaining the accomplishment of their wishes. It is most wonderful that in order to effect this, they cut out their tongues, which grow again in the course of two or three days. . . ."—Ayeen, ii. 119.

c. 1676. "The caravan being arriv'd at the foot of the Mountains which are call'd at this day by the name of Naugrocoot, abundance of people come from all parts of the Mountain, the greatest part whereof are women and maids, who agree with the Merchants to carry them, their Goods and provisions cross the Mountains. . . ."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 183.

1788. "Kote Kangrah, the fortress belonging to the famous temple of Nagorcote, is given at 49 royal cosses, equal to 99 G. miles, from Sirhind (northward)."—Rennell, Memoir, ed. 1793, p. [107].

Nujeeb, s. A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native governments; and also at one time a kind of militia under the British. Hind., from Ar. najib, 'noble.'

1813. "There are some corps (Mahratta) styled Nujeeb or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers, invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 46.

Nullah, s. Hind. nala. A water-course; not necessarily a dry water-course, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian use.

1776. "When the water fails in all the nullahs. . . ."—Halhed's Code, 52.

c. 1785. "Major Adams had sent on the 11th Captain Hebbert . . . to throw a bridge over Shinga nullah."—Carraccioli, L. of Clive, i. 93.

1789. "The ground which the enemy had occupied was entirely composed of sandhills and deep nullahs. . . ."—Munro, Narrative, 224.

1799. "I think I can shew you a situation where two embasures might be opened in the bank of the nullah with advantage."—Wellington, Despatches, i. 26.

1817. "On the same evening, as soon as dark, the party which was destined to open the trenches marched to the chosen spot, and before day-light formed a nullah . . . into a large parallel."—Mil's Hist. v. 377.

1843. "Our march tardy because of the nullahs. Watercourses is the right name, but we get here a slip-slop way of writing quite contemptible."—Life of Sir C. Napier, ii. 310.

1860. "The real obstacle to movement is the depth of the nullahs hollowed out by the numerous rivulets, when swollen by the rains."—Tenney's Ceylon, ii. 574.

Numda, sometimes Numna, s. Hind. namda and namda, from Pers. namad. Felt; sometimes a woollen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as the Ar. namaṭ, a coverlet, spread on the seat of the sovereign, etc.

1815. "That chief (Temugin or Chingiz) we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or numud, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called."—Malcolm, H. of P., i. 410.

1828. "In a two-poled tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woollen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Koollee Khan, upon a coarse numud . . ."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 254.

Nuncaties, s. (?) Rich cakes made by the Mahomedans in W. India, chiefly imported into Bombay from Surat.

Nut, Promotion, s. From its supposed indigestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite dessert-dish.

Nuzzer, s. Hind. from Arab. nazr or nazar (prop. nadhr), primarily 'a vow or votive offering'; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of in'am. The root is the same as that of Nazarite (Numbers, vi. 2).

1785. "Presents of ceremony, called nuzzers, were to many a great portion of their subsistence. . . ."—Letter in Life of Colclbrooke, 16.

1786. Tippoo, even in writing to the French Governor of Pondichery, whom it was his interest to conciliate, and in acknowledging a present of 500 muskets, cannot restrain his insolence, but calls them "sent by way of nuzr."—Select Letters of Tippoo, 377.

1809. "The Aumil himself offered the nazur of fruit."—Ld. Valentia, i. 453.

1876. "The Standard has the following curious piece of news in its Court Circular of a few days ago:—

'Sir Salar Jung was presented to the Queen by the Marquis of Salisbury, and offered his Muggur as a token of allegiance, which her Majesty touched and returned.'—Punch, July 15th.

For the true sense of the word so deliciously introduced instead of Nuzzer, see Muggur.

O.

Oart, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. orta (now more usually horta). "Any man's particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahim or Girgaum is spoken of as his oart" (Sir G. Birdwood).

1564. ". . . e me praz de fazer merce a dita cidade emfatiota para sempre que a ortaliça des ortas dos moradores Portuguezes o christãos que nesta cidade de Goa e ilha tã . . . possam vender . . ." &c.—Proclamation of Dom Sebastian, in Archiv. Port. Orient., fasc. 2, 157.

c. 1610. "Il y a vn grand nombre de Palmero ou orta, comme vous diriez ici de nos vergers, pleins d'arbres de Cocos, plantez bien pres à pres; mais ils ne viennent qu'ès lieux aquatiques et bas . . ."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 17-18.

1613. "E os naturaes habitão ao longo do ryo de Malaca, em seus pomares e orthas."—Godinho de Fregia, 11.

c. 1760. "As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grose, i. 47.

1793. "For sale . . . That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Beal; it is situated in a most lovely Oart . . ."—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12th.

Obang, s. Jap. Oh'o-ban. Lit. "greater division." The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the Kobang (q. v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 grs. troy. First issued in 1580, and last in 1860. Tavernier has a representation of one.

Old Strait, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salat Tambrav, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor's Straits (q. v.).

1727. ". . . Johore Lami, which is sometimes the Place of that King's Residence, and has the Benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeans the Straights of Sinca-pore, but by the Natives Salleta de Brew" (i. e., Salat Tambrav, as above).—A. Ham. ii. 92.

1860. "The Old Straits, through which formerly our Indiamen passed on their way to China, are from 1 to 2 miles in width, and except where a few clearings have been made . . . with the shores on both sides covered with dense jungle . . . doubtless, in old times, an isolated vessel . . . must have kept a good look out against attack from piratical prahus darting out from one of the numerous creeks."—Cavenagh, Rem. of an Indian Official, 285-6.

Ollah, s. Tam. olai, Malm. ōla. A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed caḍjan (q.v.).

In older books the term ōla generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order.

A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barbosa as follows:—

1516. "The King of Calecut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king's revenue, and his alms, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same time, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens of iron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and wherever they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands . . . and among these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men held in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of papers under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves."—Pp. 110-111, Hak. Soc., but translation modified.

1553. "All the Gentiles of India . . . when they wish to commit anything to written record, do it on certain palm-leaves which they call olla, of the breadth of two fingers."—Barros, I., ix. 3.

"All the rest of the town was of wood, thatched with a kind of palm-leaf, which they call ola."—Ibid. I., iv. vii.

1561. "All this was written by the king's writer, whose business it is to prepare his olas, which are palm-leaves, which they use for writing-paper, scratching it with an iron point."—Correa, i. 212-213.

Correa uses the word in three applications; (a) for a palm-leaf as just quoted; (b) for a palm-leaf letter; and (c) for (Coco) palm-leaf thatch.

1563. ". . . in the Maldiva Islands they make a kind of vessel which with its nails, its sails, and its cordage is all made of palm; with the fronds (which we call olla in Malavar) they cover houses and vessels."—Garcia, f. 67.

1586. "I answered that I was from Venice, that my name was Gasparo Balbi . . . and that I brought the emeralds from Venice expressly to present to his majesty, whose fame for goodness, courtesy, and greatness flew through all the world . . . and all this was written down on an olla, and read by the aforesaid 'Master of the Word' to his Majesty."—G. Balbi, f. 104.

"But to show that he did this as a matter of justice, he sent a further order that nothing should be done till they received an olla, or letter of his sign manual written in letters of gold; and so he (the King of Pegu) ordered all the families of those nobles to be kept prisoners, even to the women big with child, and the infants in bands, and so he caused the whole of them to be led upon the said scaffolding; and then the king sent the olla, ordering them to be burnt: and the Decagini executed the order, and burned the whole of them."—Id. f. 112-113.

1626. "The writing was on leaves of Palme, which they call Olla."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

1673. "The houses are low, and thatched with ollas of the Cocoe-Trees."—Fryer, 66.

c. 1690. ". . . Ola peculiariter Malabaribus dicta, et inter alia Papyri loco adhibetur."—Rumphius, i. 2.

1718. ". . . Damulian Leaves, commonly called Oles."—Prop. of the Gospel, &c., iii. 37.

1760. "He (King Alompra) said he would give Orders for Olios to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to me."—Capt. Alves in Dalrymple, O. R., i. 377.

1806. "Many persons had their Ollahs in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2d ed. 70.

1800. "The books of the Singhalese are formed to-day, as they have been for ages past, of olas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 512.

1870. ". . . Un manuscrit sur olles . . ."—Revue Critique, June 11th, 374.

Omedwaur, s. Hind. from Pers. ummedwār (ummed or umed, 'hope'). Literally, therefore, 'a hopeful one;' i.e. "an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request" (Wilson).

1816. "The thoughts of being three or four years an omedwaur, and of staying out here till fifty deterred me."—M. Elphinstone in Life, i. 344.

Omlah, s. This is properly the Arabic plural, ʿumalā, of ʿamil (see aumil). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

c. 1778. "I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 167.

1866. "At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fast which it is necessary that they shall keep with great solemnity."—Trevelyan, The Dark Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 390.

The use of an English plural omlahs here is incorrect and unusual; though omrahs is used (see next word).

1878. "... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

Omrah, s. This is properly, like the last word, an Arabic plural (Umarā, pl. of Amīr, see Ameer), and should be applied collectively to the higher officials at a Mahomedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that court; and, indeed, in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a H. plural umar-āyān=omrahs.

From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Man-ṣabdārs, from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umarā-i-ḥabār, or umarā-i-izām, "Great Amīrs;" and these would be the omrahs properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amīr-ul-Umarā (Āin, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

c. 1630. "Howbeit, out of this prodigious rent, goes yearly many great payments: to his Lieutenants of Provinces, and Vm-brayes of Townes and Forts."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 55.

1653. "Il y a quantité d'elephans dans les Indes . . . les Omaras s'en seruent par grandeur."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1666. "Les Omras sont les grand seigneurs du Roiaume, qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Thevenot, v. 307.

1673. "The President . . . has a Noise of Trumpets . . . an Horse of State led before him, a Mirchal (a Fan of Ostrich Feathers) to keep off the Sun, as the Ombrahs or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

The word Mirchal in this passage stands for Morch'hal, a fan of peacock's "feathers;" see Morchul.

1676. "Their standard, planted on the battlement, Despair and death among the soldiers sent; You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall, And shouts of victory pursued the fall."—Dryden, Aurengzebe, ii. 1.

1710. "Donna Juliana . . . let the Heer Ambassador know . . . that the Emperor had ordered the Ammaraws Enay Ullah Chan (&c.) to take care of our interests."—Valentin, iv. Surat, 284.

1727. "You made several complaints against former Governors, all of which I have here from several of my Umbras."—Firmān of Aurangzib, in A. Ham, ii. 227.

1791. "... les Omrahs ou grands seigneurs Indiens . . ."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 32.

Omum Water. A common domestic medicine in S. India, made from the strong-smelling carminative seeds of an umbelliferous plant, Carum copticum, Benth. (Ptychotis coptica, and Ptych. Ajowan of Decand.), called in Tamil omam. See Hanbury and Thicketger, 269.

Onore, n.p. See Honore.

Oojyne, n.p. Ujjayani, or, in modern vernacular, Ujjain, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.

The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglia in the interpretation of the Arabian geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Azin, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Arin, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the "Cupola of Arin or Arym," or the "Cupola of the Earth" (Al-ḡubba al-arḡh) became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth's circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Arin bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Islands it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Arin (or of Lanka, i.e. Ceylon*). They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Arin along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below), a confusion between Arin and Syene. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the ἑσπρία ἐμπορίων of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Arin. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Azin. Many conjectures were vainly made as to the origin of Arym, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned about it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Arin was simply a corruption of Ujjain. Even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, inasmuch that the word Arin had been adopted as a generic word for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Torjāni quoted below).

Ooplah, s. Cow dung patted into cakes, and dried and stacked for fuel. Hind. uplā. It is in S. India called bratty (q. v.). This fuel, which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus :—

1789. "We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do divots (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.

1863. A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 242, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

Oordoo, s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urdū means properly the camp of a Tartar Khān, and is, in another direction, the original of our word horde (Russian, orda). The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littré) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khans of the House of Batu at Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into French by Voltaire in his Orphelin de la Chine. But Littré quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urda is now used in Turkestan, e.g. at Tashkand, Khokand, &c., for a 'citadel' (Schuyler, i. 30). The word urdū, in the sense of royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Dehli was styled urdū-i-mu'alla, 'the Sublime Camp.' The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zabān-i-urdū, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urdū. On the Peshāwar frontier the word urdū is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

Oorial, s. Punj. ūṛāl, Ovis cycloceros, Hutton; the wild sheep of the Salt Range and Sulimāni Mountains.

Ootacamund, n. p. The chief station in the Neilgherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hotta-ga-mand (see Metz, Tribes of the Neilgherries, 6).

Opal, s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek, ὀπάλλιος, Sansk. upala, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Sansk. word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

Opium, s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. But from the Greek ὀπιον the Arabs took afyūn, which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The collection of the ὀπός, or juice of the poppy-capsules, is mentioned by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 77), and Pliny gives a pretty full account of the drug as opion (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 40).

The Opium-poppy was introduced into China, from Arabia, at the beginning of the 9th century, and its earliest Chinese name is A-fu-yung, a representation of the Arabic name (Bretschneider, p. 47).

The Arabic afyūn is sometimes corruptly called afīn, of which afīn, 'imbecile,' is a popular etymology. Similarly the Bengalees derive it from afi-heno, 'serpent-home.'

c. A.D. 70. "... which juice thus drawne, and thus prepared, hath power not only to provoke sleepe, but if it be taken in any great quantitie, to make men die in their sleepe: and this our Physicians call opion. Certes I have knowne many come to their death by this meanes; and namely, the father of Licinius Cecinna late deceased, a man by calling a Pretour, who not being able to endure the intolerable pains and torments of a certaine disease, and being wearie of his life, at Bilbil in Spaine, shortened his owne daies by taking opion."—Pliny, in Holland's transl. ii. 68.

1516. "For the return voyage (to China) they ship there (at Malacca) Sumatra and Malabar pepper, of which they use a great deal in China, and drugs of Cambay, much anftam, which we call opium . . ."—Barbosa, 206.

1563. "R. I desire to know for certain about amfiao, what it is, which is used by the people of this country; if it is what we call opium, and whence comes such a quantity as is expended, and how much may be eaten every day?

"O . . . that which I call of Cambaia comes for the most part from one territory which is called Malvi (Mālwa). . . . I knew a secretary of Nizamoxa, a native of Coraçon, who every day eat three tollas (see Tola), or a weight of 10½ cruzados . . . though he was a well educated man, and a great scribe and notary, he was always dozing or sleeping; yet if you put him to business he would speak like a man of letters and discretion; from this you may see what habit will do."—Garcia, 153v. to 155v.

1568. "I went then to Cambaya . . . and there I bought 60 parcels of Opium, which cost me two thousand and a hundredeth duckets, every ducket at foure shillings two pence."—Master C. Frederike, in Hak., ii. 371.

The original runs thus, showing the looseness of the translation: "... comprai sessanta man d'Anfion, che mi costò 2100 ducati serafini, che a nostro conto possono valere 5 lire l'uno."—In Ramusio, iii. 396v.

1638. "Turcae opium experiuntur, etiam in bona quantitate, innoxium et confortativum; adeo ut etiam ante praelia ad fortitudinem illud sumant; nobis vero, nisi in parvâ quantitate, et cum bonis correctivis lethale est."—Bacon, H. Vitae et Mortis (in Montague's ed. x. 188).

1726. "It will hardly be believed . . . that Java alone consumes monthly 350 packs of opium, each being of 136 catis (see Catty, though the E. I. Company make 145 catis out of it . . ."—Valentijn, iv. 61.

1727. "The Chiefs of Calcutt, for many years had vended between 500 and 1000 chests of Bengal opium yearly up in the 1770. "Patna. . . is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 lbs. . . . An excessive fondness for opium prevails in all the countries to the east of India. The Chinese emperors have suppressed it in their dominions, by condemning to the flames every vessel that imports this species of poison."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 424.

Orange, s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is in fact an ingenious medieval fabrication. The word doubtless came from the Arab. nāranj, which is again a form of Pers. nārang or nārangī, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Sansk. nāgarāṅga, and nārāṅga, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanskritised from some southern term. Sir William Jones, in his article on the Spikenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamil dictionary, most words beginning with nar have some relation to fragrance; as narukeraḍu, to yield an odour; nārtum pillei, lemon-grass; nārtei, citron; nārta manum (read marum), the wild orange-tree; nārum panei, the Indian jasmine; nārum alleri, a strong smelling flower; and nārtu, which is put for nard in the Tamil version of our scriptures." (See As. Res., vol. ii. p. 414). We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam naṛu is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. F. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vii. 114 seqq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwāl and in Sikkim, as well as in the Kāsia country (see Cossya), the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 111–112).

From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got νεράντζιον, the Spaniards naranja, old Italian naranca, the Portuguese laranja; from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article) we have the Ital. arancio, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupantur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first instance from Hehn, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulce) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a re-introduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Abulfeda extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lisbonne est la ville de Schintara; à Schintara on recueille des pommes admirables pour la grosseur et le gout" (244 †). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be doubted. For Baber (Autobiog., 328) describes an orange under the name of Sangtarah, which is, indeed, a recognized Persian and Hind. word for a species of the fruit. And this early propagation of the sweet orange in Portugal would account not only for such wide diffusion of the name of Cintra, but for the persistence with which the alternative name of Portugals has adhered to

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1873, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Lahore, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Panjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

the fruit in question. The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is portogallo, and nothing else; in Greece πορτογαλέα, in Albanian protokale, among the Kurds portoghāl; whilst even colloquial Arabic has burtukān. The testimony of Mas'ūdi as to the introduction of the orange into Syria before his time (c. A.D. 930), even if that were (as it would seem) the Seville orange, renders it quite possible that better qualities should have reached Lisbon or been developed there during the Saracenic occupation. It was indeed suggested in our hearing by the late Sir Henry M. Elliot that sangtarah might be interpreted as sangtar, 'green stones' (or in fact 'moist pips'); but we hardly think he would have started this, had the passage in Abulfeda been brought to his notice.

A.D. c. 930. "The same may be said of the orange-tree (Shajr-ul-nāranj) and of the round citron, which were brought from India after the year (A.H.) 300, and first sown in 'Oman. Thence they were transplanted to Basra, to 'Irāk, and to Syria . . . but they lost the sweet and penetrating odour and beauty that they had in India, having no longer the benefits of the climate, soil, and water peculiar to that country."—Mas'ūdi, ii. 438-9.

c. 1220. "In parvis autem arboribus quaedam crescunt alia poma citrina, minoris quantitatis frigida et acidi seu pontici (bitter) saporis, quae poma oranges ab indigenis nuncupantur."—Jacobus Vitracus, in Bongars.

These were apparently our Seville oranges.

c. 1290. "In the 18th of Edward the first a large Spanish Ship came to Portsmouth; out of the cargo of which the Queen bought one frail* of Seville figs, one frail of raisins or grapes, one bale of dates, two hundred and thirty pomegranates, fifteen citrons, and seven oranges (Poma de orange)."—Manners and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th Centuries, Roxb. Club, 1841, p. xlviii. The Editor deigns only to say that 'the MS. is in the Tower.'

1481. "Item to the galeman (galley man) brought the lampreis and oranges . . . iiijd."—Household B. of John D. of Norfolk, Roxb. Club, 1844, p. 38.

c. 1526. "They have besides (in India) the nāranj [or Seville orange, Tr.] and the various fruits of the orange species . . . It always struck me that the word nāranj was accented in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so; the men of Bajour and Siwād call nāranj nārank" (or perhaps rather nārang).—Baber, 328.

* See Frazar.

In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was nārang, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into nāranj.

Orang-otang, Orang-utan, &c., s. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simia Satyrus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, orang-utan, 'homo sylvaticus.' The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mias. Crawford says that it is never called orang-utan by 'the natives.' But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognized specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a tame hooluck (q. v.) belonging to a gentleman in E. Bengal, which was habitually known to the natives at the station as janglī admī, literally = orang-utan.

1631. "Loqui vero eos easque posse lavani aiunt, sed non velle, ne ad labores cogantur; ridicule mehercules. Ormus or Ormuz, n. p. Properly Hurmuz or Hurmaz, a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbās or Gombroon (q. v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerūn or Jerūn, which may be identified with the Organa of Nearchus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Albuquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1515, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shāh 'Abbās, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1622. The place was destroyed by the Persians, and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain.

Orombarros, s. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-baharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India.

1711. At Madras . . . "refreshments for the Men, which they are presently supplied with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Peny at the first coming of Orombarros, as they call those who have not been there before."—Lockyer, 28.

Oortolan, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandrella brachydactyla, Temm., in H. bargel, and acc. to Jerdon, bagheri, baghoda. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pyrrhuloxia grisea, Scopoli.

Otta, Otter, s. Corruption of ātā, 'flour,' a Hindi word having no Sanskrit original. Popular rhyme:

"Ai teri Shekhāwati Adha ātā adha matī!"

"Confound this Shekhawati land,
My bread's half wheat-meal and half sand."

Boileau, Tour through Rajwara,
1837, p. 274.

Otto, Otter, s. Or usually 'Otto of Roses,' or by imperfect purists 'Attar of Roses,' an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Ghāzipūr on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. 'itr, 'perfume.' From this word are derivatives 'attār, 'a perfumer or druggist,' 'attārī, adj. 'pertaining to a perfumer.' And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Lattarini, 'the Street of the perfumers' shops.' We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1573. "Issuing thence to the Cayzerie by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called of the Atarin, which is the Spicery."—Marmol, Africa, ii. f. 88.

1824. "The attar is obtained after the rose-water is made, by setting it out during the night and till sunrise in the morning in large open vessels exposed to the air, and then skimming off the essential oil which floats at the top."—Heber, i. 154 (ed. 1844).

Oudh, Oude, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhya (Skt. 'not to be warred against') the capital of Rāma, on the right bank of the river Sarayu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow (Lakhnao) for about 150 years has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawabs, and from 1814 kings of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country re-conquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Lieut.-Governorship of the N. W. Provinces.

B. C. 2. "The noble city of Ayodhya crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and besprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Rāma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow's sun."—Ramayana, Bk. iii. (Ayodhya Kanda), ch. 3.

636. "Departing from this Kingdom (Kanyākubja or Kanauj) he (Hwen Tsang) travelled about 600 li to the S.E., crossed the Ganges, and then taking his course southerly he arrived at the Kingdom of 'Ouyt'o (Ayodhya)."—Pélerin's Bouddh., ii. 267.

1255. "A peremptory command had been issued that Malik Kūtluḡ Khān . . . should leave the province of Awadh, and proceed to the fief of Bharājī, and he had not obeyed. . . ."—Tabaḡāt-i-Nāsiri, E.T. by Raverty, 107.

1289. "Mu'izzu-d dīn Kai-Kubād, on his arrival from Delhi, pitched his camp at Oudh (Ajudhya) on the bank of the Ghāgra. Nasiru-d dīn, from the opposite side, sent his chamberlain to deliver a message to Kai-Kubād, who by way of intimidation himself discharged an arrow at him. . . ."—Amir Khusrū in Elliot, iii. 530.

c. 1335. "The territories to the west of the Ganges, and where the Sultan himself lived, were afflicted by famine, whilst those to the east of it enjoyed great plenty. These latter were then governed by 'Ain-ul-Mulk . . . and among their chief towns we may name the city of Awadh, and the city of Zafarābād and the city of Laknau, et cetera."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 342.

c. 1340. The 23 principal provinces of India under Mahommed Tughlak are thus stated, on the authority of Sirajuddin Abu'l-fatah Omah, a native of 'Awadh': "(1) Aklīm Dīhlī, (2) Multān; (3) Kahrānī (Guhram), and (4) Samān (both about Sirhind); (5) Siwastān (Sehwān in Sind), (6) Waja (Ūja, i.e. Ūch), (7) Hāsī (Hānsī), (8) Sarsatī (Sirsa), (9) Ma'bar (Coromandel), (10) Tiling (Kalinga), (11) Gurātī, (12) Badāun, (13) 'Awadh, (14) Kanauj, (15) Laknautī (N. Bengal), (16) Bahār, (17) Karra (Lower Doāb), (18) Malwa (Malwa), (19) Lahāwar (Lahore), (20) Kalanūr (E. Punjab), (21) Jajnagar (Orissa), (22) Tiling (?), (23) Dursamand (Mysore)."—Shihābuddin, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 167-171.

Outcry, s. Auction. This term seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England. See Neelam.

The old Italian expression for auction seems to be identical in sense, viz., gridaggio, and the auctioneer gridatore, thus:

c. 1343. "For jewels, and plate; and (other) merchandize that is sold by outcry (gridaggio), i.e. by auction (oncantō) in Cyprus, the buyer pays the crier (gridatore) one quarter carat per bezant on the price bid for the thing bought through the crier, and the seller pays nothing except, &c."—Pegolotti, 74.

1627. "Out-crit of goods to be sold. G(allice) Encant. Incant. I(taliche).—Incantō . . .

1787. "Having put up the Madrass Galley at Outery and nobody offering more for her than 2300 Rupees, we think it more for the Company's Int. to make a Sloop of Her than let Her go at so low a price."—Fort William MS. Reports, March.

Overland. Specifically applied to the Mediterranean route to India, which in former days involved usually the land journey from Antioch or thereabouts to the Persian Gulf; and still in vogue, though any land journey may now be entirely dispensed with, thanks to M. Lesseps.

1629. "The news of his Exploits and Death being brought together to King Philip the Fourth, he writ with his own hand as follows. Considering the two Pinks that were fitting for India may be gone without an account of my Concern for the Death of Nunno Alvarez Botello, an Ezpress shall immediately be sent by Land with advice."—Faria y Sousa (Stevens), iii. 373.

P.

Paddy, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have, in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canarese batta or bhatta, 'rice in the husk,' which is also found in Mahratti as bhāt with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to 'cooked rice.' The last meaning is that of Sansk. bhaktā, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay pādī, Javan. pārī, is 'rice in the straw.' And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles's Java, i. 239—240, and Crawfurd's Hist., iii. 345, and Descript. Dict. 368). Crawfurd (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is improbable, for as he himself has shown (Desc. Dict., u. s.), the word pārī, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connexion of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

Paddy-bird, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidae or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European's name for the Ardeola leucop-tera, Boddaert, 'andhā baglā' ('blind heron') of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white birds—Herodias alba, L., or Ardea Torra, Buch. Ham., and Herodias egretoides, Temminck, or Ardea putea, Buch. Ham.

Padre, s. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padre to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religiosi or regulars. In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide application, has now in that country a still wider, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form pa-ti-li.

Pagar, s. a. This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702. "Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Benccolen."—Charters of E. I. Co., p. 324.

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind. (Arab.) word ihāṭa, 'a fence, enclosure,' in the sense of Presidency: Bombay kī ihāṭa, Bangāl kī ihāṭa, a sense not given in Shakespear or Forbes; it is given in Fallon.

b. (pagār). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for 'wages.' It is obviously the Port. verb pagar, 'to pay,' used as a substantive.

Pagoda, s. This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.

a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous "Porcelain tower" of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical.

In the 17th cent. we find the word sometimes misapplied to places of Mahomedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the "Pagoda of Mecca."

b. An idol.

c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the varāha or hān of the natives; the former name (fr. Skt. for 'boar') being taken from the Boar avatār of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying 'gold,' no doubt identical with sonā, and an instance of the exchange of h and s. See also Pardao in Suppt.

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kās (or cash, q.v.; 8 kās = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda). In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.* The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 3½ rupees. In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deduceable from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-t'ah, 'precious pile,' and Poh-kuh-t'ah (white-bones-pile.)† Anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouths of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing, see Neelam); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barbosa set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese pagão, 'a pagan.' It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of dagoba. The latter is a genuine word, used in Ceylon, but known in Continental India, since the extinction of Buddhism, only in the most rare and exceptional way (see Dagoba).

A fourth suggestion connects it with the Sanskrit bhagavat, 'holy, divine,' or Bhagavati, applied to Durga and other goddesses; and a fifth makes it a corruption of the Pers. but-kadah, 'idol-temple'; a derivation given below by Ovington. There can be little doubt that the origin really lies between these two.

The two contributors to this book are somewhat divided on this subject:—

(1) Against the derivation from

* i.e. (Hindustani) Padīshāh Agra meñ hai?

* Prinsep's Useful Tables, by E. Thomas, p. 19.

bhagavat, 'holy,' or the Mahratti form bhagavant, is the objection that the word pagode from the earliest date has a final e, which was necessarily pronounced. Nor is bhagavant a name for a temple in any language of India. On the other hand but-kadah is a phrase which the Portuguese would constantly hear from the Mahomedans with whom they chiefly had to deal on their first arrival in India. This is the view confidently asserted by Reinaud (Mémoires sur l'Inde, 90), and is the etymology given by Littré.

As regards the coins, it has been supposed, naturally enough, that they were called pagoda, because of the figure of a temple which some of them bear; and which indeed was borne by the pagodas of the Madras Mint, as may be seen in Thomas's Prinsep, pl. xlv. But in fact coins with this impress were first struck at Ikkeri at a date after the word pagode was already in use among the Portuguese. However, nearly all bore on one side a rude representation of a Hindu deity (see, e.g., Krishnarāja's pagoda, c. 1520), and sometimes two such images. Some of these figures are specified by Prinsep (Useful Tables, p. 41), and Vartema speaks of them: "These pardai . . . have two devils stamped upon one side of them, and certain letters on the other" (115—116). Here the name may have been appropriately taken from bhagavat. (A. B.)

On the other hand, it may be urged that the resemblance between but-kadah and pagode is hardly close enough, and that the derivation from but-kadah does not easily account for all the uses of the word. Indeed, it seems admitted in the preceding paragraph that bhagavat may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now is it not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.*

* "The prayer that they say daily consists of these words: 'Pacautā! Pacautā! Pacautā!' And this they repeat 104 times."—(Bk. iii. ch. 17.) The word is printed in Ramusio pacanca; but no one

We thus have four separate applications of the word pacautā, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz., to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hinduidol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, 'sacred,' or to Bhagavat and Bhagavati, used as names of divinities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durga in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavati as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson's work on the Mackenzie MSS., we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xcvi. (vol. ii.) note of an account "of a temple of Bhagavati;" at p. ciii. "Temple of Man-nadi Bhagavati goddess . . .;" "Temple of Palliarakave Bhagavati . . .;" at p. civ. "Temple of Mangombu Bhagavati . . .;" "Temple of Padde-parkave Bhagavati . . .;" "Temple of the goddess Pannáyennar Kave Bhagavati . . .;" "Temple of the goddess Patáli Bhagavati . . .;" "Temple of Bhagavati . . .;" p. cvii. "Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. . .;" p. cviii. "Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati;" "Acc. of the goddess Val-lur Bhagavati." The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paolino, p. 79 and p. 57, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on "Coorg Superstitions," Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadrā Kālī (i.e. Durgā) is "also called Pogōdi, Pavodi, a tad-bhava of Bagavati" (Ind. Antiq., ii. 170)—an incidental remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagode. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was familiar with the constant confusion of c and t in medieval manuscript will reject this correction of M. Pauthier's. Bishop Caldwell observes that the word was probably Bagava, or Pagava, the Tamil form of Bhagavata, "Lord"; a word reiterated in their sacred formulæ by Hindus of all sorts, especially Vaishnava devotees. The words given by Marco Polo, if written "Pagoda! Pagoda! Pagoda!" would be almost indistinguishable in sound from Pacautā.

current in the mouths of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bagavati and butkadah which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple, the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term? (H. Y.)† The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516. "There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Ujaven. . . . Their business is to work at baked clay, and tiles for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed . . . Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of

"I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., bhagavat, 'god'; bhagavati, 'goddess'.

"Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopuram or propylon at once attracts attention, and a stranger inquiring what it was, would be told 'the house or place of Bhagavat.' The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durga, or, as she is commonly called, simply 'Dev' (or Bhagavati, 'the goddess'). . . . In like manner a figure of Durga is found on most of the gold huns (i.e., pagoda coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was 'the goddess,' i.e., it was 'Bhagavati.'"

† As my friend can no longer represent his own view, it seems right to print here the latest remarks of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated 10th March, 1880. "I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the e in Pagode was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavat. In modern Portuguese e is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Pagoda, it must come from Bhagavati; but though the goddess is and was worshipped to a certain extent in S. India, it is by other names (Amma, &c.). Gundert and Kittel give 'Pogodi' as a name of a Durga temple, but assuredly this is no corruption of Bhagavati, but Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

"Bhagavat can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagavan (Tamil, payavan). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Śiva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagavan; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagavanti, &c., there is the difficulty about the e, to say nothing of the nt."

This is Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro orazioni fanno molte strigherie e necromantie, le quali chiamano Pagodes, differenti assai dall'altre" (Ramusio, i. f. 308v.). In the Portuguese MS. published by the Lisbon Academy in 1812, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

"In this City of Goa, and all over India, there are an infinity of ancient buildings of the Gentiles, and in a small island near this, called Dinari, the Portuguese, in order to build the city, have destroyed an ancient temple called Pagode, which was built with marvellous art, and with ancient figures wrought to the greatest perfection in a certain black stone, some of which remain standing, ruined and shattered, because these Portuguese care nothing about them. 1597. "I think well to order and decree that the pagodes which come from without shall not be current unless they be of forty and three points (assay?) conformable to the first issue, which is called of Agra, and which is of the same value as that of the San Tomes, which were issued in its likeness."—Edict of the King, in Archiv. Port. Orient. iii). 782.

1598. "There are yet other sorts of money called Pagodes . . . They are Indian and Heathenish money with the picture of a Diuell vpon them, and therefore are called Pagodes . . .”—Linschoten, 54 and 69.

1602. “And he caused to be sent out for the Kings of the Decan and Canara two thousand horses from those that were in Goa, and this brought the King 80,000 pagodes, for every one had to pay forty as duty. These were imported by the Moors and other merchants from the ports of Arabia and Persia; in entering Goa they are free and uncharged, but on leaving that place they have to pay these duties.”—Couto, IV. vi. 6.

1623. “. . . An Indian Gentile Lord called Rama Rau, who has no more in all than 2000 pagod of annual revenue, of which again he pays about 800 to Venktaṇa Naieka, whose tributary he is . . .”—P. della Valle, ii. 692.

1673. “About this time the Rajah . . . was weighed in Gold, and poised about 16,000 Pagods.”—Fryer, 80.

1676. “For in regard these Pagods are very thick, and cannot be clipt, those that are Masters of the trade, take a Piercer, and pierce the Pagod through the side, halfway or more, taking out of one piece as much Gold as comes to two or three Sous.”—Tavernier, Travels, ii. 4 (Eng. tr. 1684).

1785. “Your servants have no Trade in this country, neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas.”—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke's Speech on the Nabob's Debts, Works, ed. 1852, iv. 18.

1796. “La Bhagavadi, moneta d'oro, che ha l'immagine della dea Bhagavadi, nome corrotto in Pagodi o Pagode dagli Europei, è moneta rotonda, convessa in una parte . . .”—Fra Paolino, 57.

1803. “It frequently happens that in the bazaar, the star pagoda exchanges for 4 rupees, and at other times for not more than 3.”—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 375.

Pagoda-Tree. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India.

1877. “India has been transferred from the regions of romance to the realms of fact . . . the mines of Golconda no longer pay the cost of working, and the pagoda-tree has been stripped of all its golden fruit.”—Blackwood's Magazine, 575.

1881. “It might be mistaken . . . for the work of some modern architect, built for the Nabob of a couple of generations back, who had enriched himself when the pagoda-tree was worth the shaking.”—Sat. Review, Sept. 3, p. 307.

Palankeen, Palanquin, s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men; 4 always in Bengal; 6 sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Baqaim (Wasai) and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. panyāṅkā, or palyāṅka, ‘a bed,’ from which we have Hind. and Mahr. pa-lang, ‘a bed,’ Hind. pālki, ‘a palanquin,’ Pali pallanko, ‘a couch, bed, litter, or palanquin’ (Childers), and in Javanese and Malay palangki, ‘a litter or sedan’ (Crawford).*

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Latin phalanga) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz., ‘a cowl-staff.’ It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

The thing appears already in the Ramāyana. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and by John Marignolli (both c. 1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of pālki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 515, and Ain, i. 254).

As drawn by Linschoten (1597), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1760), the palanquin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. Williamson (V. M., i. 316 seqq.) gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of last century. Up to 1840–50 most people in Calcutta kept a palanquin and set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palankin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 8000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor journeys) after this fashion. But in the decade named the palankin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the dawk-garry (a Palkee-garry or palankeen-carriage, horsed by ponies posted along the road, under the Post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palankin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

* In Canticles, iii. 9, the “ferculum quod fecit sibi rex Salomon de lignis Libani” is in the Hebrew appiryōn, which has by some been supposed to be Greek φορείον; highly improbable, as the litter came to Greece from the East. Is it possible that the word can be in some way taken from panyāṅka?

c. 1340. "Some time afterwards the pages of the Mistress of the Universe came to me with a dūla . . . It is like a bed of state . . . with a pole of wood above . . . this is curved, and made of the Indian cane, solid and compact. Eight men, divided into two relays, are employed in turn to carry one of these; four carry the palankin whilst four rest. These vehicles serve in India the same purpose as donkeys in Egypt; most people use them habitually in going and coming. If a man has his own slaves, he is carried by them; if not he hires men to carry him. There are also a few found for hire in the city, which stand in the bazars, at the Sultan's gate, and also at the gates of private citizens."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 386.

c. 1350. "Et eciam homines et mulieres portant super scapulas in lecticis de quibus in Canticis: ferculum fecit sibi Salomon de lignis Libani, id est lectulum portatilem sicut portabar ego in Zayton et in India."—Marignolli (see Cathay, &c., p. 331).

1515. "And so assembling all the people made great lamentation, and so did throughout all the streets the women, married and single, in a marvellous way. The captains lifted him (the dead Albuquerque) seated as he was in a chair, and placed him on a palanquin, so that he was seen by all the people; and João Mendes Botelho, a knight of Afonso d'Albuquerque's making (who was) his Ancient, bore the banner before the body."—Correa, Lendas, II. i. 460.

1563. ". . . and the branches are for the most part straight except some . . . which they twist and bend to form the canes for palenquins and portable chairs, such as are used in India."—Garcia, f. 194.

1567. ". . . with eight Falchines (fachini), which are hired to carry the palanchines, eight for a Palanchine (palanchino), four at a time."—C. Frederike in Hakl. ii. 348.

1598. ". . . after them followeth the bryde between two Com neres, each in their Pallamkin, which is most costly made."—Linschoten, 56.

1606. "The palanquins covered with curtains, in the way that is usual in this Province, are occasion of very great offences against God our Lord" . . . (the Synod therefore urges the Viceroy to prohibit them altogether, and) . . . "enjoins on all ecclesiastical persons, on penalty of sentence of excommunication, and of forfeiting 100 pardaos to the church court * not to use the said palanquins, made in the fashion above described."—4th Act of 5th Council of Goa, in Archivo Port. Oriental, Fasc. 4. See also under Boy.

1608-9. "If coming forth of his Pallace, hee (Jahāngir) get vp on a Horse, it is a signe that he goeth for the Warres; but if he vp vpon an Elephant or Palankine, it will bee but an hunting Voyage."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 219.

1616. ". . . Abdala Chan, the great governour of Amadanas, being sent for to Court in disgrace, coming in Pilgrim's Clothes with fortie servants on foote, about sixtie miles in counterfeit humiliation, finished the rest in his Pallanke."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 552.

In Terry's account, in Purchas, ii. 1475, we have a Pallanke, and (p. 1481) Palanka; in a letter of Tom Coryate's (1615) Palankeen.

1623. "In the territories of the Portuguese in India it is forbidden to men to travel in palankin (Palanchino) as in good sooth too effeminate a proceeding; nevertheless as the Portuguese pay very little attention to their laws, as soon as the rains begin to fall they commence getting permission to use the palankin, either by favour or by bribery; and so, gradually, the thing is relaxed, until at last nearly everybody travels in that way, and at all seasons."—P. della Valle, i. 611.

1659. "The designing rascal (Sivaji). . . conciliated Afzal Khán, who fell into the snare . . . Without arms he mounted the palki, and proceeded to the place appointed under the fortress. He left all his attendants at the distance of a long arrow-shot . . . Sivaji had a weapon, called in the language of the Dakhin bichúd (i.e. 'scorpion') on the fingers of his hand, hidden under his sleeve . . ."—Kháfi Khán, in Elliott, vii. 259. See also p. 509.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldaeus as Pallinkijn. Tavernier writes Palleki and sometimes Pallanquin; Bernier has Paleky.

1726. ". . . Palangkyn dragers" (palankin-bearers).—Valentijn, Ceylon, 45.

1736. "Palanquin, a kind of chaise or chair, borne by men on their shoulders, much used by the Chinese and other Eastern peoples for travelling from place to place."—Bailey's Dict., 2d ed.

1750-52. "The greater nobility are carried in a palekee, which looks very like a hammock fastened to a pole."—Toreen's Voyage to Surat, China, &c., ii. 201.

1754-58. In the former year the Court of Directors ordered that Writers in their Service should "lay aside the expense of either horse, chair, or Palankeen, during their Writership." The Writers of Fort William (4th Nov. 1756) remonstrated, begging "to be indulged in keeping a Palankeen for such months of the year as the excessive heats and violent rains make it impossible to go on foot without the utmost hazard of their health." The Court, however, replied (Feb. 11, 1756): "We very well know that the indulging Writers with Palankeens has not a little contributed to the neglect of business we complain of, by affording them opportunities of rambling;" and again, with an obduracy and fervour too great for grammar (March 3, 1758): "We do most positively order and direct (and will admit of no representation for postponing the execution of) that no Writer whatsoever be permitted to keep either palankeen, horse, or chaise, during his Writership, on pain of being immediately dismissed from our service."—In Long, pp. 54, 71, 130.

1780. "The Nawaub, on seeing his condition was struck with grief and compassion; but . . . did not even bend his eyebrow at the sight, but lifting up the curtain of the Palkee with his own hand, he saw that the eagle of his (Ali Ruza's) soul, at one flight had winged its way to the gardens of Paradise."—H. of Hydur, p. 429.

"The Sun in gaudy palanqueen
Curtain'd with purple, fring'd with gold,

Firing no more heav'n's vault serene,
Retir'd to sup with Ganges old."

Plassy Plain, a ballad by Sir W. Jones; in Life and Works, ed. 1807, ii. 503.

1804. "Give orders that a palanquin may be made for me; let it be very light, with the pannels made of canvas instead of wood, and the poles fixed as for a dooley. Your Bengally palanquins are so heavy that they cannot be used out of Calcutta."—Wellington (to Major Shaw), 20th June.

The following measures a change in ideas. A palankin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1808. "Palkee. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankeen. A Guzerat punster (aware of no other) hazards the Etymology Pa-lakhee [pā-lākhi] a thing requiring an annual income of a quarter Lack to support it and corresponding luxuries."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

"Woe! Woe! around their palankeen,
As on a bridal day
With symphony and dance and song,
Their kindred and their friends come on,
The dance of sacrifice! The funeral song!
Kehama, i. 6.

1808. "The conveyances of the island (Madaira) are of three kinds, viz.: horses, mules, and a litter, cyleped a palanquin, being a chair in the shape of a bathing-tub, with a pole across, carried by two men, as doolees are in the east."—Welsh, Reminiscences, i. 282.

c. 1830. "Un curieux indiscret reçut un galet dans la tête; on l'emporta baigné de sang, couché dans un palanquin."—V. Jacquemont, Corr. i. 67.

1880. "It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General sometimes condescended to be carried in a Palanquin—a mode of conveyance which, except for long journeys away from railroads, has long been abandoned to portly Baboos, and Eurasian clerks."—Sat. Rev., Feb. 14.

1881. "In the great procession on Corpus Christi Day, when the Pope is carried in a palanquin round the Piazza of St. Peter, it is generally believed that the cushions and furniture of the palanquin are so arranged as to enable him to bear the fatigue of the ceremony by sitting whilst to the spectator he appears to be kneeling."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 231.

Palaveram, n.p. A town and cantonment 11 miles S.W. from Madras. The name is Pallāvaram, probably Palla-puram, the 'town of the Pallas'; the latter a caste claiming descent from the Pallavas who ruled at Conjeveram. (Seshagiri Sastrī.)

Pale Ale. The name formerly given to the beer brewed for Indian use. See Beer.

1784. "London Porter and Pale Ale, light and excellent, Sicca Rupees 150 per hhd."—Advt. in Seton-Karr, i. 39.

1793. "For Sale . . . Pale Ale (per hhd. . . Rs. 80)."—Bombay Courier, Jan. 19th.

1848. "Constant dinners, tiffins, pale ale, and claret, the prodigious labour of cutchery, and the refreshment of brandy

Th. Gautier à Ch. Garnier.

Palempore, s. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe had become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain,—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponymic,—and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-posh, 'a bed-cover,' which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of Salempore as a kind of stuff. See under Piece-goods.

1648. "Int Gouverne van Raga mandragā . . . . werden veel . . . Salamporij . . . gemaect."—Van den Broecke, 87.

1813.

"A stain on every bush that bore
A fragment of his palampore,
His breast with wounds unnumber'd riven,
His back to earth, his face to heaven . . ."

Byron, The Giaour.

1814. "A variety of tortures were inflicted to extort a confession; one was a sofa, with a platform of tight cordage in network, covered with a palampore, which concealed a bed of thorns placed under it: the collector, a corpulent Banian, was then stripped of his jama, or muslin robe, and ordered to lie down."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 429.

1817. ". . . these cloths . . . serve as coverlids, and are employed as a substitute for the Indian palampore."—Raffles, Java, 171.

1862. "Bala posh, or Palang posh, quilt or coverlet, 300 to 1000 rupees."—Punjab Trade Report, App., p. xxxviii.

1880. ". . . and third, the celebrated palampores, or 'bed-covers,' of Masulipatam, Fatehgarh, Shikarpur, Hazara, and other places, which in point of art decoration are simply incomparable."—Birdwood, The Industrial Arts of India, 260.

Pali, s. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently well-founded tradition Magadhī, the dialect of what we now call South Bahar, in which Sakya Muni discoursed. It is one of the Prākritis or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearly 2000 years. Pāli in Sanskrit means a line, row, series; and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pālī-bhāṣā is then 'the language of the Sacred Texts,' i.e., Magadhī; and this is called elliptically by the Singhalese Pāli, which we have adopted in like use. It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon. Pāli is "a sort of Tuscan among the Prākritis" from its inherent grace and strength (Childers). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallelism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pāli, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pāli language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the Books of Religion as "being in an eloquent style which the Vulgar people do not understand" (p. 75); and in another passage says: "They have a Language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their Books are writ in" (p. 109).

1690. ". . . this Doubt proceeds from the Siameses understanding two Languages, viz., the Vulgar, which is a simple Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monosyllables, without Conjugation or Declension; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Learned, which is called the Balie Tongue, and which is enrich with the inflexions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Offices, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borrow'd from the Balie."—De la Loubère's Siam, E. T. 1693, p. 9.

1795. "Of the ancient Pāllis, whose language constitutes at the present day the sacred text of Ava, Pegue, and Siam, as well as of several other countries eastward of the Ganges: and of their migration from India to the banks of the Cali, the Nile of Ethiopia, we have but very imperfect information * . . . It has been the opinion of some of the most enlightened writers on the languages of the East, that the Pali, the sacred language of the priests of Boodh, is nearly allied to the Shanscrit of the Bramins: and there certainly is much of that holy idiom engrafted on the vulgar language of Ava, by the introduction of the Hindoo religion."—Symes, 337-8.

1818. "The Talapoins . . . do apply themselves in some degree to study, since according to their rules they are obliged to learn the Sada, which is the grammar of the Pali language or Magata, to read the Vini, the Padimot . . . and the sermons of Godama . . . All these books are written in the Pali tongue, but the text is accompanied by a Burmese translation. They were all brought into the kingdom by a certain Brahmin from the island of Ceylon."—Sangermano's Burmese Empire, p. 141.

1837. "Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and classical language, the Magadhi or Pali, is of greater antiquity than the Sanscrit; and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which, in their judgment, are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word Pali signifies original, text, regularity; and there is scarcely a Buddhist scholar in Ceylon, who, in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse,—Sā Magadhi; mūla bhāsā (etc.).

"There is a language which is the root; . . . men and brāhmans at the commencement of the creation, who never before heard nor uttered a human accent, and even the Supreme Buddhos, spoke it: it is Magadhi."

This verse is a quotation from Kachchāyano's grammar, the oldest referred to in the Pali literature of Ceylon . . . Let me . . . at once avow, that, exclusive of all philological considerations, I am inclined, on prima facie evidence—external as well as internal—to entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the buddhists on this particular point."—George Turnour, Introd. to Mahāvanso, p. xxii.

1874. "The spoken language of Italy was to be found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth-time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the finest and most cultivated of the vernaculars, raised it at once to the position of dignity which it still retains. Read Sanskrit for Latin, Magadhese for Tuscan, and the Three Baskets for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete . . . Like Italian Pali is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, elision, or crasis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought."—Childers, Preface to Pali Dict., pp. xiii-xiv.

Palkee-garry, s. A 'palankin-coach,' as it is termed in India; i.e., a carriage shaped somewhat like a palankin on wheels; Hind. pālki-gāri. The word is however one formed under European influences.

1878. "The Governor-General's carriage . . . may be jostled by the hired 'palki-garry,' with its two wretched ponies, rope harness, nearly naked driver, and wheels whose sinuous motions impress one with the idea that they must come off at the next revolution."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 38.

This description applies rather to the cranchee (q.v.) than to the palkee-garry, which is (or used to be) seldom so sordidly equipt.

Palmyra, s. The fan-palm (Borassus flabelliformis), which is very commonly cultivated in S. India and Ceylon (as it also is indeed in the Ganges valley from Farakhābād down to the head of the Delta), and hence was called by the Portuguese par excellence, palmeira or 'the palm-tree.'* It is an important tree in the economy of S. India, Ceylon, and parts of the Archipelago as producing jaggery (q.v.) or 'palm-sugar'; whilst the wood affords rafters and laths, and the leaves gives a material for thatch, mats, umbrellas, fans, and a substitute for paper. Its minor uses are many: indeed it is supposed to supply nearly all the wants of man, and a Tamil proverb ascribes to it 801 uses (see Ferguson's Palmyra-Palm of Ceylon, and Tennent's Ceylon, i. 111, ii. 519 seqq.).

Palmyra Point, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro. This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmyra trees on which are conspicuous.

Palmyras, Point, n. p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brāhmaṇi delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hoogly, all the more for the dangerous shoal off it. A point of the Mahanadi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called False Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmyras.

1553. "... o Cabo Segógora, a que os nossos chamam das Palmeiras por humas que alli estam, as quaes os navegantes notam por lhes dar conhecimento da terra. E deste cabo ... fazemos fim do Reyno Orixá."—Barros, I., ix. 1.

1598. "... 2 miles (Dutch) before you come to the point of Palmerias, you shall see certain blacke houels standing vpon a land that is higher then all the land there abouts, and from thence to the Point it beginneth againe to be low ground and ... you shall see some small (but not ouer white) sandie Downes ... you shall finde being right against the point de Palmerias ... that vpon the point there is neyther tree nor bush, and although it hath the name of the Point of Palm-trees, it hath notwithstanding right forth, but one Palme tree."—Linschoten, 3d Book, ch. 12.

1823. "It is a large delta, formed by the mouths of the Maha-Nuddee and other rivers, the northernmost of which insulates Cape Palmiras."—Heber (ed. 1844), i. 88.

Panchāṅgam, s. Sansk. = 'quinque-partite.' A native almanac in S. India is called so, because it contains information on five subjects, viz., Solar Days, Lunar Days, Asterisms, Yogas, and karaṇas (certain astrological divisions of the days of a month).

Panchanga is used also, at least by Buchanan below, for the brahman who keeps and interprets the almanac for the villagers.

1612. "Every year they make new almanacs for the eclipses of the Sun and of the Moon, and they have a perpetual one which serves to pronounce their auguries, and this they call Panchagṛ̥ho."—Couto, V. vi. 4.

1651. "The Bramins, in order to know the good and bad days, have made certain writings after the fashion of our Almanacks, and these they call Panjangam."—Rogierius, 55. This author gives a specimen (pp. 63-69).

1800. "No one without consulting the Panchanga, or almanac-keeper, knows when he is to perform the ceremonies of religion."—Buchanan's Mysore, etc., i. 234.

Pandal, Pendaal, s. A shed. Tamil.

1651. "... it is the custom in this country when there is a Bride in the house to set up before the door certain stakes somewhat taller than a man, and these are covered with lighter sticks on which foliage is put to make a shade ... This arrangement is called a Pandaal in the country speech."—Rogierius, p. 12.

1717. "Water-Bandels, which are little sheds for the Convenience of drinking Water."—Phillips's Account, 19.

1745. "Je suivis la procession d'un peu loin, et arrivé aux sepultures, j'y vis un pandal ou tente dressée, sur la fosse du defunt; elle était ornée de branches de figuier, de toiles peintes, &c. L'intérieur était garnie de petites lampes allumées."—Norbert, Mémoires, iii. 32.

1800. "I told the farmer that, as I meant to make him pay his full rent, I could not take his fowl and milk without paying for them; and that I would not enter his pundull, because he had not paid the labourers who made it."—Letter of Sir T. Munro in Léfe, i. 283.

1814. "There I beheld, assembled in the same pandal, or reposing under the friendly banian-tree, the Gosannee in a state of nudity, the Yogee with a lark or paroquet, his sole companion for a thousand miles."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 465.

1815. "Pandaals were erected opposite the two principal fords on the river, where under my medical superintendence skilful natives provided with eau-de-luce and other remedies were constantly stationed."—Dr. McKenzie, in Asiatic Researches, xiii. 329.

Pandāram, s. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Śūdra, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu Castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, paṇḍāram. C. P. Brown says the paṇḍāram is properly a Vaishnava, but other authors apply the name to Śaiva priests.

1711. "... But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain ... and killing the Pandarrum; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them."—Letter in Wheeler, ii. 163.

1717. "... Bramans, Pantarongal, and other holy men."—Phillips's Account, 18.

The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1718. "Abundance of Bramanes, Pandares, and Poets . . . flocked together."—Progn. of the Gospel, ii. 18.

1745. "On voit ici quelquefois les Pandarams ou Penitens qui ont été en pèlerinage à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent ici avec grand soin de l'eau du Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés."—Nobert, Mém. iii. 28.

c. 1760. "The Pandarams, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth."—Grose, i. 252.

1798. "The other figure is of a Pandaram or Senassey, of the class of pilgrims to the various pagodas."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, preface.

1800. "In Chera the Pājāris (see poo-jaree) or priests in these temples are all Pandarums, who are the Sūdras dedicated to the service of Siva's temples . . ."—Buchanan's Mysore, etc., ii. 338.

1809. "The chief of the pagoda (Rameswaram), or Pandaram, waiting on the beach."—Ld. Valentia, i. 338.

1860. "In the island of Nainativoe, to the south-west of Jafna, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naga Tambiran, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared by the Pandarams, and daily fed at the expense of the worshippers."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 373.

Pandarāni, n.p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the middle ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema's statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the "Sacrifice Rōck" of our charts. The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalāni (approx. lat. 11° 26'), a little way north of Koilandi. It is seen below in Ibn Batuta's notice that Pandarāni afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sankey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feby., 1881: "One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes . . . Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junks, such as Pandarāni, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your 'Pandarāni' was nothing but the roadstead of Coulete (Coulandi or Quelande of our Atlas). The Master Attendant who accompanied me, appears to have a good opinion of it as an anchorage, and as well sheltered."

c. 1150. "Fandarina is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Manibār [Malabar], where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor. The inhabitants are rich, the markets well supplied, and trade flourishing."—Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 90.

1296. "In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Mabarh (Ma'bar or Coromandel), Pei-nan (?) and Fantalaia, three foreign kingdoms, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 ting in paper money."—Chinese Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, 532.

c. 1300. "Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindābūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjarūr, then the country of Hili, then the country of (Fandaraina*)."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1321. "And the forest in which the pepper groweth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrīna, and the other Cyngilin" (see Shinkali).—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 7b.

c. 1343. "From Boddattān we proceeded to Fandaraina, a great and fine town with gardens and bazars. The Muslims there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. . . . It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter" (i.e. the S.W. monsoon).—Ibn Batuta, iv. 88. (Compare Roteiro below.)

c. 1442. "The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dismissal departed from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bandinanah (read Pandarānah) situated on the coast of Malabar, (he) reached the port of Mangalor. . . ."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in XVth Cent., 20.

1510. “Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day's journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port.”—Varthema, 133.

1516. “Further on, south south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which also there are many ships.”—Barbosa, 152.

1536. “Martim Afonso . . . ran along the coast in search of the paraos, the galleys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunhalemarcar with 25 paraos, which the others had sent to collect rice; and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Pandarane, Diogo de Reynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother . . . and Diogo Corvo . . . set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunhale, when he knew it was Martim Afonso, laid all pressure on his oars to double the Point of Tiracole. . . .”—Correa, iii. 775.

Pandy, s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pānde was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jōt, or subdivisional branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. “The first two men hung” (for mutiny) “at Barrackpore were pandies by caste, hence all sepoy were pandies, and ever will be so called” (Bourchier, as below).

1857. “As long as I feel the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this iniquitous combination, I cannot feel gloom. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion.”—H. Greathed, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 99.

1857. “We had not long to wait before the line of guns, howitzers, and mortar carts, chiefly drawn by elephants, soon hove in sight. . . . Poor Pandy, what a pounding was in store for you! . . .”—Bourchier, Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army, 47.

Pangara, Pangaia, s. From the quotations, a kind of boat used on the E. coast of Africa.

1591. “. . . divers Pangaras or boates, which are pinned with wooden pinnes, and sowed together with Palmito cordes.”—Barker in Hakluyt, ii. 538.

1598. “In this fortresse of Sofala the Captaine of Mossambique hath a Factor, and twice or thrice every yere he sendeth certaine boats called Pangaios, which saile along the shore to fetch gold, and bring it to Mossambique.

“These Pangaios are made of light planks, and sowed together with cords, without any nailles.”—Lnnschoten, ch. 4.

1616. “Each of these bars, of Quilmane, Cuama, and Luabo, allows of the entrance of vessels of 100 tons, viz. galeots and pangaios, loaded with cloths and provisions; and when they enter the river they discharge cargo into other light and very long boats called almadias . . .”—Bocarro, Decada, 534.

Pangolin, s. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Pangūlang, ‘the creature that rolls itself up.’ It is the Manis pentadactyla of Linn.; called in H. bajarikīṭ (i.e. Skt. vajrakīṭa, ‘adamant reptile’). We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Busbeck below); was not this also the creature that Bertrand de la Brocquière met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued “it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vaudrei struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon.” A.D. 1432.—T. Wright's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 290 (Bohn).

It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeck, with an interval of nearly 2,000 years!

We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus.

c. B.C. 445. “Here in this desert, there live amid the sand great ants, in size somewhat less than dogs, but bigger than foxes. The Persian King has a number of them, which have been caught by the hunters in the land whereof we are speaking . . .”—Herod. iii. 102 (Rauvlinson's tr.).

1562. Among presents to the G. Turk from the King of Persia: “in his inusitati generis animantes, qualem memini dictum fuisse allatam formicam Indicam mediocris canis magnitudine, mordacem admodum et saevam.”—Busbequii Opera, Elzev., 1633, p. 343.

Panicale, s. This is mentioned by Bluteau (vi. 223), as an Indian disease, a swelling of the feet. Câle is here probably the Tamil Kâl, ‘leg.’

Panikar, Panyca, &c., s. Malayal. panikan, ‘a fencing master, a teacher;’ but at present it more usually means ‘an astrologer.’

1518. “And there are very skilful men who teach this art (fencing), and they are called Panicars.”—Barbosa, 128.

1553. “And when (the Naire) comes to the age of 7 years he is obliged to go to the fencing-school, the master of which (whom they call Panical) they regard as a father, on account of the instruction he gives them.”—Barros, I., ix. 3.

1554. “To the panical (in the Factory at Cochín) 300 reis a month, which are for the year 3600 reis.”—S. Botelho, Tombo, 24.

1583. “The maisters which teach them, be graduats in the weapons which they teach, and they bee called in their language Panycaes.”—Castañeda (by N. L.), f. 36v.

1599. “L’Archidiacre pour assurer sa personne fit appeller quelques-uns des principaux Maitres d’Armes de sa Nation. On appelle ces Gens-là Panicaux. . . Ils sont extremement redoutez.”—La Croze, 101.

1604. “The deceased Panical had engaged in his pay many Nayres, with obligation to die for him.”—Guerreiro, Relacion, 90.

1606. “Paniquais is the name by which the same Malauares call their masters of fence.”—Gouvea, f. 28.

1644. “To the cost of a Penical and 4 Nayres who serve the factory in the conveyance of the pepper on rafts for the year 12,960 res.”—Bocarro, MS., 316.

Panthay, Panthé, s. This is the name applied of late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahommedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Talifu, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahommedan is Pathi, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthé to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Fytche has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297–8). But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: ‘Panthé, I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying ‘native or indigenous.’ It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahommedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for sale as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samshu and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pa-thi again is the old Burmese word for ‘Mahommedan.’ It is applied to all Mahommedans other than the Chinese Panthé. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but is, I believe, a corruption of Pārsi or Fārsi,’ i.e. Persian.’*

The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Pasei in Sumatra, which during part of the later Middle Ages was a kind of metropolis of Islam in the Eastern Seas.†

We may mention two possible origins for Panthé, as indicating lines for further enquiry:

A. The title Pathi (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Camboja, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Rémusat, there is a notice of a sect in Camboja called Pa-sse. The author identifies them, in a passing way, with the Tao-sse, but that is a term which Fahian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-sse, the Chinese writer says, “wear a red or white cloth on their heads, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnificence with those of the Buddhists . . . In their temples there are no images . . . they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-sse never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine" etc. (Rémusat, Nouv. Mél. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahommedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahommedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Panthé a Shan term for Mahommedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectic variation of the Passe of Camboja, the Pathi of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

* He adds:—“The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahommedans ‘Pathi-Kula,’ and Hindus ‘Hindu-Kula,’ when they wish to distinguish between the two” (see Kula).

B. We find it stated in Lieut. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ti (see Garnier, Voy. d'Expl., i. 518). This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Panthe. But we find that Pen-ti ('root-soil') is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for 'aborigines'; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahommedans.

Panwell, n. p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in præ-railway days a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese; e.g.:

1644. "This Island of Caranja is quite near, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Melique, viz., Carnallé, Drugo, Pene, Sabayo, Abitta, and Panoel."—Bocarro, MS., f. 227.

* Cushing's Shan Dictionary gives Past for Mahommedan. We do not find Panthé.

1804. "P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that, notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Wellington, from "Candolla," 8th March.

Papaya, Papaw, s. This word seems to be from America like the insipid, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Carica papaya, L.) A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malacca. Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender, which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners arand-kharbūza, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt* from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Moodeen Sheriff it has a Perso-arabic name 'ababai-i-Hindī; in Canarese it is called P'arangi-hannu ('Frank or Portuguese fruit'). The name papaya according to Oviedo as quoted by Littré (Oviedo, t. 1, p. 333, Madrid, 1851, "we cannot find it in Ramusio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was ababai.* Strange liberties are taken with the spelling. Mr. Robinson (below) calls it popeya; Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S., xxxv. 232), poppoi (ῥόποι).

c. 1550. "There is also a sort of fruit resembling figs, called by the natives Papaie . . . peculiar to this kingdom" (Peru).—Girol. Benzoni, 242.

1598. "There is also a fruit that came out of the Spanish Indies, brought from beyond the Philippinas or Lusons to Malacca, and thence to India, it is called Papaia, and is very like a Melon . . . and will not grow, but always two together, that is male and female . . . and when they are divided and set apart one from the other, then they yield no fruit at all . . . This fruit at the first for the strangeness thereof was much esteemed, but now they account not of it."—Linschoten, 97.

Parabyke, s. Burmese pāra-beik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of daphne, which is agglutinated into a kind of paste-board and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screen-fashion, into a note book, and written on with a steatite pencil. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara; and from La Loubère we see that it is or was also used in Siam. The Canara books are called kaḍatam, and are described by Col. Wilkes under the name of cudduttum, carruttum, or currut (Hist. Sketches, Preface, I. xii.). They appear exactly to resemble the Burmese para-beik, except that the substance blackened is cotton cloth instead of paper. "The writing is similar to that on a slate, and may be in like manner rubbed out and renewed. It is performed by a pencil of the balapum or lapis ollaris; and this mode of writing was not only in ancient use for records and public documents, but is still universally employed in Mysoor by merchants and shopkeepers, I have even seen a bond, regularly witnessed, entered in the cudduttum of a merchant, produced and received in evidence.

"This is the word karret, translated 'palm-leaf' (of course conjecturally) in Mr. Crisp's translation of Tippoo's regulations. The Sultan prohibited its use in recording the public accounts; but altho' liable to be expunged, and affording facility to permanent entries, it is a much more durable material and record than the best writing on the best paper. . . . It is probable that this is the linen or cotton cloth described by Arrian, from Nearchus, on which the Indians wrote."

1688. "The Siamese make Paper of old Cotton rags, and likewise of the bark of a Tree named Ton cor . . . but these Papers have a great deal less Equality, Body and Whiteness than ours. The Siamese cease not to write thereon with China Ink. Yet most frequently they black them, which renders them smoother, and gives them a greater body; and then they write thereon with a kind of Crayon, which is made only of a clayish earth dried in the Sun. Their Books are not bound, and consist only in a very long Leaf . . . which they fold in and out like a Fan, and the way which the Lines are wrote, is according to the length of the folds. . . ."—De la Loubère, Siam, E. T., p. 12.

1855. "Booths for similar goods are arrayed against the corner of the palace palisades, and at the very gate of the Palace is the principal mart for the stationers who deal in the para-beiks (or black books) and steatite pencils, which form the only ordinary writing materials of the Burmese in their common transactions."—Mission to Ava, p. 139.

Paranghee, s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to syphilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, whilst the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe.

The word is apparently=Firinghi, 'European' or (in S. India) 'Portuguese;' and this would perhaps point to association with syphilis.

Parbutty, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the patel, sometimes the village-crier, etc., also in some places a superintendent or manager. It is a corruption of Telug. and Canarese, pāra-patti, Mahr. and Konkani, pārpattiya, from Skt. pravṛitti, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Portuguese documents in such forms as perpotim, etc.

We presume that the Great Duke (audax omnia perpeti!) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explana- tion of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Patell."

1567. "... That no unbeliever shall serve as scrivener, shroff (xarrafo), mocondum, naique, peon, parpatrim, collector (saccador), constable (? corrector), interpreter, procurator, or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge by which they may in any way whatever exercise authority over Christians . . ."—Decree 27 of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Oriental, Fascic. 4.

1800. "In case of failure in the payment of these instalments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parputty or accomptant of the division."—Buchanan's Mysore, ii. 151-2.

1878. "The staff of the village officials . . . in most places comprises the following members . . . the crier (parpoti) . . ."—Fonseca, Sketch of Goa, 21-22.

Parrell, n. p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Imperial Gazetteer that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parrell requires examination, as it appears to have been so occupied in Grose's time. The 2nd edition of Grose, which we use, is dated 1772, but he appears to have left India about 1760.

1554. Parrell is mentioned as one of 4 aldeas, "Parrell, Varella, Varell, and Siva, attached to the Kasbah (Caçaba, see Cusba) of Maim."—Botelho, Tombo, 157, in Subsídios.

c. 1750-60. "A place called Parrell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some foul practices against the English interest."—Grose, i. 46.

Pariah, Parriar, &c., s. a. The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly 'a drummer.' Tamil parai is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary beaters of it are called (sing.) paraiyan, (pl.) paraiyar. In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestics in European service in that part of India. As with other castes low in caste-rank they are low also in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objectionable food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar class, the name Pariah has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lowest castes, or even to denote out-castes or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariahs, e.g. the caste of shoemakers, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariah deals out the same disparaging treatment to these that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariahs "constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has 'subdivisions' of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu population."—Bp. Caldwell, u. i., p. 545.

Sir Walter Elliot however in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Paraiya all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not conclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, pp. 540-554. That scholar's deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognizes force in, arguments for believing that they may have been descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians.

This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adduces a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.*

Thus, in the celebration of the * Sir W. Elliot refers to the Asoka inscription (Edict II.) as bearing Palaya or Paraya, named with Choda (or Chola), Kerala, &c. as a country or people "in the very centre of the Dravidian group . . . a reading which, if it holds good, supplies a satisfactory explanation of the origin of the Paria name and nation" (in J. Ethnol. Soc. N. S., 1869, p. 108). But apparently the reading has not held good, for M. Senart reads the name as Pa ya (see Ind. Ant. ix. 287).

Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a kind of Saturnalia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: 'My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order among themselves.'

The mistaken use of pariah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann in his School Geography of India: "Outcasts are called pariahs." The name first became generally known in Europe through Sonnerat's Travels (pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Parias figure as the lowest of castes. The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to its appearance in the Abbé Raynal's famous Hist. Philosophique des Etablissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre's preposterous though once popular tale, La Chaumière Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name.

It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly, "The word Paria is unknown" (in our sense?) "to all natives, unless as learned from us."

b. See Pariah-Dog.

1516. "There is another low sort of Gentiles who live in desert places, called Paras. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the devil, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated. . . . They live on the imane (iname, i.e. 'yams'), which are like the root of iucca or batate found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 310.

N.B. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Parent, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parcens. So we are not quite sure that Paras is the proper reading, though this is probable.

1626. "... The Paras are of worse esteeme."—(W. Methold, in) Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

"... the worst whereof are the abhorred Pariawes . . . they are in publicke Justice the hateful executioners, and are the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seene."—Ibid. 998-9.

1648. "... the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, nevertheless there is a caste called Parayaes (they are the most contemned of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dipt in the water) who eat it freely."—Van de Broecke, 82.

1672. "The Parreas are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat mice and rats), in a word a contemned and stinking vile people."—Baldaus (Germ. ed.), 410.

1711. "The Company allow two or three Peons to attend the Gate, and a Parrear Fellow to keep all clean."—Lockyer, 20.

"And there . . . is such a resort of basket-makers, Scavengers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Parriars, to drink Toddy, that all the Punch-houses in Madras have not half the noise in them."—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1717. "... Barrier, or a sort of poor people that eat all sort of Flesh and other things, which others deem unclean."—Phillips, Account, &c., 127.

1726. "As for the separate generations and sorts of people who embrace this religion, there are, according to what some folks say, only 4; but in our opinion they are 5 in number, viz.:

- a. The Bramins.
- β. The Settreas.
- γ. The Weynyas or Veynsyas.
- δ. The Sudras.

1780. "If you should ask a common cooly, or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, 'the same as master, pariar-cast.'"—Munro's Narrative, 28-9.

1787. "... I cannot persuade myself that it is judicious to admit Parias into battalions with men of respectable casts. . ."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791. "Le masalchi y courut pour allumer un flambeau; mais il revient un peu après, pris d'haleine, criant: 'N'approchez pas d'ici; il y a un Paria!' Aussitôt la troupe effrayée cria: 'Un Paria! Un Paria!' Le docteur, croyant que c'était quelque animal féroce, mit la main sur ses pistolets. 'Qu'est ce que qu'un Paria?' demanda-t-il à son porte-flambeau."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chaumière Indienne, 48.

1800. "The Parriar, and other impure tribes, comprising what are called the Panchum Bundum, would be beaten, were they to attempt joining in a Procession of any of the gods of the Brahmins, or entering any of their temples."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 20.

c. 1805-6. "The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of cast and absolute destruction to any Brahmin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their language to a Pariar Prengi. This reproach of Pariar is what we have tamely and strangely submitted to for a long time, when we might with a great facility have assumed the respectable character of Chatriya."—Letter of Leyden, in Morton's Mémoire, ed. 1819, p. lxvi.

1809. "Another great obstacle to the reception of Christianity by the Hindoos, is the admission of the Parias in our Churches. . ."—Ld. Valentia, i. 246.

Very good rhyme, but no reason. See under Nautch.

The word seems also to have been adopted in Java, e.g.:

1860. "We Europeans . . . often . . . stand far behind compared with the poor pariahs."—Max Havelaar, ch. vii.

Pariah-Arrack. In the 17th and 18th centuries this was a name commonly given to the poisonous native spirit commonly sold to European soldiers and sailors.

1671-72. "The unwholesome liquor called Parier-arrack. . ."—Sir W. Langhorne, in Wheeler, iii. 422.

1711. "The Tobacco, Beetle, and Pariar Arrack, on which such great profit arises, are all expended by the Inhabitants."—Lockyer, 13.

1754. "I should be very glad to have your order to bring the ship up to Calcutta . . . as . . . the people cannot here have the opportunity of intoxicating and killing themselves with Pariar Arrack."—In Long, 51. See Fool-Back.

Pariah-Dog, s. The common ownerless yellow dog, that frequents all inhabited places in the East, is universally so-called by Europeans, no doubt from being a low-bred caste-less animal; often elliptically 'pariah' only.

1789. ". . . A species of the common cur, called a pariar-dog."—Munro, Narr. p. 36.

1810. "The nuisance may be kept circling for days, until forcibly removed, or until the pariah dogs swim in, and draw the carcase to the shore."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 261.

1824. "The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouac."—Heber (ed. 1844), i. 79.

1875. "Le Musulman qui va prier à la mosquée, maudit les parias honnis."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, Avril, 539.

Pariah-Kite, s. The commonest Indian kite, Milvus Govinda, Sykes, notable for its great numbers, and its impudence. "They are excessively bold and fearless, often snatching morsels off a dish en route from kitchen to hall, and even, according to Adams, seizing a fragment from a man's very mouth" (Jerdon). Compare quotation under Brahminy Kite.

Parsee, n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and, retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahomedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Pārsī, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Fārsī. The Portuguese have used both Parseo and Perseo. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Persee; from the former doubtless we got Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see Panthay) a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahomedan.

c. 1328. "There be also other pagan-folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain roofless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. These believe in two First Principles, to wit, of Evil and of Good, of Darkness and of Light."—Priar Jordanus, 21.

1552. "In any case he dismissed them with favour and hospitality, showing himself glad of the coming of such personages, and granting them protection for their ships as being (Parseos) Persians of the Kingdom of Ormuz."—Barros, l. viii. 9.

"... especially after these were induced by the Persian and Guzerati Moors (Mouros, Parseos e Guzarates) to be converted from heathen (Gentios) to the sect of Mahamed."—Id., II. i. 1.

1616. "There is one set among the Gentiles, which neither burne nor interre their dead (they are called Parcees) who incircle pieces of ground with high stone walls, remote from houses or Road-ways, and therein lay their Carcasses, wrapped in Sheetes, thus having no other Tombes but the gorges of rauenous Fowles."—Terry in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1630. "Whilst my observation was bestowed on such inquiry, I observed in the town of Surrat, the place where I resided, another Sect called the Persees . . ."—Lord, Two Foreign Sects.

1638. "Outre les Benjans il y a encore vne autre sorte de Payens dans le royaume de Gusuratte, qu'ils appellent Parsis. Ce sont des Perses de Fars, et de Chorasan."—Mandelslo (Paris, 1659), 213.

1648. "They (the Persians of India, i.e. Parsees) are in general a fast-gripping and avaricious nation (not unlike the Benjans and the Chinese), and very fraudulent in buying and selling."—Van Twist, 48.

1672. "Non tutti ancora de' Gentili sono d' vna medesima fede. Alcuni descendono dalli Persiani, li quali si conoscono dal colore, ed adorano il fuoco . . . In Suratte ne trouai molti . . ."—P. F. Vincenzo Maria, Viaggio, 234.

1673. "On this side the Water are people of another Offspring than those we have yet mentioned, these be called Parseys . . . these are somewhat white, and I think nastier than the Gentues . . ."—Fryer, 117.

"The Parsies, as they are called, are of the old Stock of the Persians, worship the Sun and Adore the Elements; are known only about Surat."—Id. p. 197.

Parvoe, Purvo, s. The popular name of the writer-caste in Western India, Prabhū or Parbhā, lord or chief (Skt. prabhu), being an honorific title assumed by the caste of Kayat or Kayastha, one of the mixt castes which commonly furnished writers. A Bombay term only.

1548. "And to the Parvu of the Tenadar Mor 1800 reis a year, being 3 pardaos a month. . . ."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 211.

1809. "The Bramins of this village speak and write English; the young men are mostly parvoes, or writers."—Maria Graham, 11.

1813. "These writers at Bombay are generally called Purvoes; a faithful diligent class."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 156-157.

1833. "Every native of India on the Bombay Establishment, who can write English, and is employed in any office, whether he be a Brahman, Goldsmith, Parwary, Portuguese, or of English descent, is styled a Purvoe, from several persons of a caste of Hindoos termed Prubhoe having been among the first employed as English writers at Bombay."—Macintosh on the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 77.

Pasador, s. A marlin-spike. Sea-Hind., from Port. passador.—Roebuck.

Pasei, Pacem, n. p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Jajapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Basma of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

c. 1292. "When you quit the kingdom of Ferlec you enter upon that of Basma. This also is an independent kingdom, and the people have a language of their own; but they are just like beasts, without laws or religion."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 9.

1511. "Next day we departed with the plunder of the captured vessel, which also we had with us; we took our course forward until we reached another port in the same island Trapobana (Sumatra), which was called Pazze; and anchoring in the said port, we found at anchor there several junks and ships from divers parts."—Em-poli, p. 53.

1553. "In the same manner he (Diogo Lopes) was received in the kingdom of Pacem. . . and as the King of Pedir had given him a cargo of pepper . . . he did not think well to go further . . . in case . . . they should give news of his coming at Malacca, those two ports of Pedir and Pacem being much frequented by a multitude of ships that go there for cargoes."—Barros, II. iv. 31.

1726. "Next to this and close to the East-Point of Sumatra is the once especially famous city Pasi (or Pacem), which in old times, next to Magapahit and Malakka, was one of the three greatest cities of the East . . . but now is only a poor open village with not more than 4 or 500 families, dwelling in poor bamboo cottages."—Valentijn (v.) Sumatra, 10.

1727. "And at Pissang, about 10 Leagues to the Westward of Diamond Point, there is a fine deep River, but not frequented, because of the treachery and bloody disposition of the Natives."—A. Ham. ii. 125.

Pât, s. A can or pot. Sea-Hind, from English.—Roebuck.

Pataca, Patacoon, s. Ital. patacco; Provenc. patuc; Port. pataca and patação; also used in Malayalam. A term, formerly much diffused, for a dollar or piece of eight. Littré connects it with an old French word patard, a kind of small coin, "du reste, origine inconnue." But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abūṭāka (or corruptly būṭāka, see also Dozy & Eng. s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning 'father of the window, or niche'; the scutcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillar-dollars are called in modern Egypt abū medfa, 'father of a cannon'; and the Maria Theresa dollar abu fēra, 'father of the bird.' But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof, still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abū nuḳāt, 'father of dots,' from certain little points which mark the right issue.

Patch, s. "Thin pieces of cloth at Madras" (Indian Vocabulary, 1788). Wilson gives patch as a vulgar abbreviation for Telug. pach'chadamu, 'a particular kind of cotton cloth, generally 24 cubits long and 2 broad; two cloths joined together.'

Patchouli, Patch-leaf, also Putch, and Putchaleaf, s. In Beng. pachapāt. The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Heyneanus, Benth., a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazar in Hindustan. The pacha-pât is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as a hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying amongst clothes as we use lavender.

In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson's Nomenclature to be Bengali. Littré says the word patchouli is patchey-elley, 'feuille de patchey'; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pachcha, 'green,' and êlâ, êlam, an aromatic perfume for the hair.

1673. "Note, that if the following Goods from Acheen hold out the following Rates, the Factor employed is no further responsible.

Patch Leaf, 1 Bahar Maunds 7 20 sear."—Fryer, 209.

Patcharée, Patcherry, Parcherry, s. In the Bengal Presidency, before the general construction of 'married quarters' by Government, patcharée was the name applied in European corps to the cottages which used to form the quarters of married soldiers. The origin of the word is obscure, and it has been suggested that it was a corruption of pichch'hârî, 'the rear,' because these cottages were in rear of the barracks. But we think it most likely that the word was brought, like many other terms peculiar to the British soldier in India, from Madras, and is identical with a term in use there, parcherry or patcherry, which represents the Tamil parash'shêri, 'a Pariah village,' or rather the quarter or outskirts of a town or village where the Pariahs reside.

1781. "Leurs maisons (c.-à-d. des Parias) sont des cahutes où un homme peut à peine entrer, et elles forment de petits villages qu'on appelle Paretcheris."—Sonnerat, ed. 1782, i. 98.

1878. "During the greater portion of the year extra working gangs of scavengers were kept for the sole purpose of going from Parcherry to Parcherry and cleaning them."—Report of Madras Municipality, p. 24.

c. 1880. "Experience obtained in Madras some years ago with reconstructed parcherries, and their effect on health, might be imitated possibly with advantage in Calcutta."—Report by Army Sanitary Commission.

Pateca, s. This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris, Schrader; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.) It is from the Arabic al-battikh or al-bittikh. F. Johnson gives this 'a melon, muskmelon. A pumpkin; a cucurbitaceous plant.' We presume this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucurbitaceous nomenclature both vulgar and scientific is universal (see A. De Candolle, Origine des Plantes cultivées. In Lane's Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word butteekh is rendered explicitly 'water-melon.' We have also in Spanish albadeca, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as 'espèce de melon'; and we have the French pastèque, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Græco-Roman world about the beginning of our era; whilst Hehn carries it to Persia from India, 'whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, though that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.'

The name pateca, looking to the existence of essentially the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia De Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquio XXXVI, the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia's housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Diu, and in the Balaghat, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal; but "those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds,—not sweet (doce) like the Portugal melons, but bland (suaue), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestions of the liver and kidneys, &c." Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it batiec indi, i.e., melon of India (F.

Johnson gives 'bitṭikḥ-i hindī, the citrul'; whilst in Persian hinduwāna is also a word for water-melon, but that the real Indian country name was calangari (Mahr. kālingar, 'a water-melon'). Ruano then refers to the budiecas of Castille of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese of that time (1563, see Colloquios, f. 141v. seqq.)

[A friend who has Burnell's copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on bateca: "i.e., the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahomedans." I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that sense) in either Shakespeare or Fallon. The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is (P.) tarbuza, whilst the musk-melon is (P.) kharbuza. And these words are so rendered from the Āin respectively by Blochmann (see his E. T. i. 66, "melons . . . water-melons," and the original i. 67, "kharbuza . . . tarbuza."). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as "water-melon." And according to Hehn the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbuz and in Mod. Greek καρπούσα, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish kārpūz, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropt in modern pronunciation.* H. Y.]

* We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson Smith:

"(1.) The classical form of the Ar. word is bitṭikḥ. Bitṭikḥ is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don't think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an i.

"(2.) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Lane); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus "the wild bitṭikḥ" is the colocynth, and with other adjectives it may be used of very various cucurbitaceous fruits (see examples in Dozy's Suppl.).

"(3.) The biblical form is abattikḥ (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has 'melons.') But this is only the 'water-melon'; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek αγροστέων. Low justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon 1598. "... ther is an other sort like Melons, called Patecas or Angurias, or Melons of India, which are outwardlie of a darke greene colour; inwardlie white with blacke kernels; they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyst that as a man eateth them his mouth is tull of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat, wherefore manie of them are eaten after dinner to coole men."—Linschoten, 97.

c. 1610. "Toute la campagne est couverte d'arbres fruitiers . . . et d'arbres de coton, de quantité de melons et de pateques, qui sont espèce de citrouilles de prodigieuse grosseur . . ."—Pyrrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 286.

A few pages later the word is written Pasteques.—Ib. 301.

1673. "From hence (Elephanta) we sailed to the Putachoes, a Garden of Melons (Putacho being a Melon) were there not wild Rats that hinder their growth, and so to Bombaim."—Fryer, 76.

Patel, Potail, s. The head-man of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of government. In Mahr. patil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat (Mahr.) 'a roll or register.' The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, "and appears to be an essentially Marāthi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general" (Wilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Moniyar (Maniyakāram), adhikāri, &c., are the appropriate synonyms in Tamil and Malabar districts.

1804. "The Patel of Beitculgaum, in the usual style of a Mahratta patel, keeps a band of plunderers for his own profit and advantage. You will inform him that if he does not pay for the horses, bullocks, and articles plundered, he shall be hanged also."—Wellington, 27th March.

1809. "... Pattels, or headmen."—Lord Valentia, i. 415.

they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For batṭikḥ Syriac has patṭikḥ, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Hehn's view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Mikhlol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budiecas."

1814. "At the settling of the jumma-bundee, they pay their proportion of the village assessment to government, and then dispose of their grain, cotton, and fruit, without being accountable to the patell."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 418.

1819. "The present system of Police, as far as relates to the villagers may easily be kept up; but I doubt whether it is enough that the village establishment be maintained, and the whole put under the Mamludar. The Potail's respectability and influence in his village must be kept up."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 81.

1820. "The Potail holds his office direct of Government, under a written obligation . . . which specifies his duties, his rank, and the ceremonies of respect he is entitled to; and his perquisites, and the quantity of freehold land allotted to him as wages."—T. Coats, in Tr. Bo. Lit. Soc. iii. 183.

1823. "The heads of the family . . . have purchased the office of Potail, or headman."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 99.

1826. "The potail offered me a room in his own house, and I very thankfully accepted it."—Pundurang Hari, 241.

1851. "This affected humility was in fact one great means of effecting his elevation. When at Poonah he (Madhaje Sinda) . . . instead of arrogating any exalted title, would only suffer himself to be called Pateil. . ."—Fraser, Mil. Mem. of Skinner, i. 33.

1870. "The Potail accounted for the revenue collections, receiving the perquisites and percentages, which were the accustomed dues of the office."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 163.

Patna, n. p. The chief city of Bahar; and the representative of the Palibothra of the Greeks (Pataliputra); Hind. Pattana, "the city."

1586. "From Bannaras I went to Patenaw downe the riuer of Ganges . . . Patenaw is a very long and a great towne. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zelabdim Echebar, the great Mogor . . . In this towne there is a trade of cotton, and cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they carry from hence to Bengala and India, very much Opium and other commodities."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 388.

1616. "Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful Province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large Provinces within it, Purb and Patan, the one lying on the east, and the other on the west side of the River Ganges."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 357.

1673. "Sir William Langham . . . is Superintendent over all the Factories on the coast of Coromandel, as far as the Bay of Bengala, and up Hugly River . . . viz. Fort St. George, alias Maderas, Pettipolee, Mechlapatan, Gundore, Medapollon, Balasore, Bengala, Hugly, Castle Duzzar, Pattanaw."—Fryer, 38.

1726. "If you go higher up the Ganges to the N. W. you come to the great and famous trading city of Pattana, capital of the Kingdom of Behar, and the residence of the Vice-roy."—Valentijn, v. 164.

1727. "Patana is the next Town frequented by Europeans . . . for Saltpetre and raw Silk. It produces also so much Opium, that it serves all the Countries in India with that commodity."—A. Ham, ii. 21.

Patola, s. Canarese and Mal<sup>a</sup>. pattuda, 'a silk-cloth.' In the fourth quotation it is rather misapplied to the Ceylon dress (v. Comboy).

1516. "Coloured cottons and silks which the Indians called patola."—Barbosa, 184.

1522. ". . . Patolos of silk, which are cloths made at Cambaya that are highly prized at Malaca."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 714.

1545. ". . . homems . . . encachados com patolas de seda."—Pinto, ch. cix. (Cogan, p. 219).

1552. "They go naked from the waist upwards, and below it they are clothed with silk and cotton which they call patolas."—Castanheda, ii. 78.

1614. ". . . Patollas . . ."—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

Pattamar, Patimar, &c., s. This word has two senses:

a. A foot-runner, a courier. In this use the word occurs only in the older writers, especially Portuguese.

b. A kind of lateen-rigged ship, with one, two, or three masts, common on the west coast. This sense seems to be comparatively modern. In both senses the word is perhaps the Konkani path-mâr, 'a courier.* C. P. B., however, says that pattamar, applied to a vessel, is Malayâl. signifying "goose-wing."

1552. ". . . But Lorenço de Brito, seeing things come to such a pass that certain Captains of the King (of Cananor) with troops chased him to the gates, he wrote to the Viceroy of the position in which he was by Patamares, who are men that make great journeys by land."—De Barros, II. i. 5.

The word occurs repeatedly in Correa, Lendas, e. g. III. i. 108, 149, &c.

1598. ". . . There are others that are called Patamares, which serve onlie for Messengers or Posts, to carie letters from place to place by land in winter-time when men cannot travaille by sea."—Linschoten, 78.

* Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. gives both patemâri and phatemâri for "a sort of swift-sailing vessel, a pattimar," with the etym. "tidings-bringer." Patia is tidings, but the second part of the word so derived is not clear.

1606. "The eight and twentieth, a Patemar told that the Governor was a friend to us only in shew, wishing the Portugalls in our room; for we did no good in the Country, but brought Wares which they were forced to buy. . . ."—Roger Hawes, in Purchas, i. 605.

c. 1666. "Tranquebar, qui est éloigné de Saint Thomé de cinq journées d'un Courier à pié, qu'on appelle Patamar."—Thevenot, v. 275.

1673. "After a month's Stay here a Patamar (a Foot Post) from Fort St. George made us sensible of the Dutch being gone from thence to Ceylon."—Fryer, 36.

1689. "A Pattamar, i.e. a Foot Messenger, is generally employ'd to carry them (letters) to the remotest Bounds of the Empire."—Ovington, 251.

1705. "Un Patemare qui est un homme du Pais; c'est ce que nous appellons un expres. . . ."—Luillier, 43.

1758. "Yesterday returned a Pattamar or express to our Jew merchant from Aleppo, by the way of the Desert. . . ."—Ives, 297.

c. 1760. "Between Bombay and Surat there is a constant intercourse preserved, not only by sea, . . . but by Pattamars, or foot-messengers overland."—Grose, i. 119.

This is the last instance we have met of the word in this sense, which is now quite unknown to Englishmen.

b.

1600. ". . . Escrevia que hum barco pequeno, dos que chamam patamares, se meteria. . . ."—Lucena, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 185.

1834. A description of the Patamars, with a plate, is given in Mr. John Edye's paper on Indian coasting vessels, in vol. i. of the R. As. Soc. Journal.

1860. "Among the vessels at anchor lie the dows of the Arabs, the petamares of Malabar, the dhoneys of Coromandel. . . ."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

Pattello, Patellee, s. A large flat-bottomed boat on the Ganges; Hind. patēla.

1685. "We came to a great Godowne, where . . . this Nabobs Son has laid in a vast quantity of Salt, here we found divers great Patellos taking in their lading for Pattana."—Hedges, Jan. 6.

1860. "The Putelee (or Kutura), or Baggage-boat of Hindostan, is a very large, flat-bottomed, clinker-built, unwieldy-looking piece of rusticity of probably . . . about 35 tons burthen; but occasionally they may be met with double this size."—Colesworthy Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 6.

Paulist, n. p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India, because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern reestablishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don't like them.

c. 1567. ". . . e vi sono assai Chiese dei padri di San Paulo i quali fanno in quei luoghi gran profitto in conuertire quei popoli."—Federici, in Ramus. iii. 390.

1623. "I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Daman, at Bassaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paulist than by that of Jesuits."—P. della Valle, 27th April.

c. 1650. "The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paulists; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brims."—Tavernier, E. T., 77.

1672. "There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handsome convent, and Church of the Paulists, or Disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola. . . ."—Baldaus, Germ., p. 110.

In another passage this author says they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673. "St. Paul's was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulistins."—Fryer, 150.

c. 1760. "The Jesuits, who are better known in India by the appellation of Paulists, from their head church and convent of St. Paul's in Goa."—Grose, i. 50.

Paunchway, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dinghy (q.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Beng. panši, and panšoi.

c. 1760. "Ponsways, Guard-boats."—Grose (Glossary).

1780. "The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower."—Hodges, 39-40.

1790. "Mr. Bridgwater was driven out to sea in a common paunchway, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Masulipatam."—Calcutta Monthly Review, i. 40.

1823. ". . . A panchway, or passage-boat . . . was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a snuffer-dish; a deck fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches. . . ."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 21.

1860. ". . . You may suppose that I engage neither pinnace nor bujra,* but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bhouliya*—or, what is more likely at a fine-weather season like this, a small native punsōee, which, with a double set of hands, or four oars, is a lighter and much quicker boat.”—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10.

Pawl, s. H. pāl. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole.

1785. “Where is the great quantity of baggage belonging to you, seeing that you have nothing besides tents, pawls, and other such necessary articles.”—Tippoo's Letters, p. 49.

Pawn, s. The betel-leaf (q.v.) Hind. pān, from the Sansk. parṇa, ‘a leaf.’ It is a North-Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-sooparie (supārī † is Hind. for areca).

1616. “The King giving mee many good words, and two pieces of his Pawne out of his Dish, to eate of the same he was eating. . .” — Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 576.

1809. “On our departure pawn and roses were presented, but we were spared the attar, which is every way detestable.” — Lord Valentia, i. 101.

Pawnee, s. Hind. pānī, ‘water.’ The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilā-yatī pānī, ‘soda-water,’ brandy-pawnee, Khush-bō pānī (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindi ode to Water, on the Pindaric theme ἄριστον μὲν ὕδωρ, or the Thaletic one οὐκ ἀρχὴ δὲ τῶν πάντων ὕδωρ!

Pānī āṭā, pānī dāl;
Pānī bāgh, pānī ramna;
Pānī Ganga, pānī Jamna;
Pānī haṇṣṭā, pānī rotā;
Pānī jagṭā, pānī sotā;
Pānī bāp, pānī mā;
Barā nām pānī kā !”

† “These leaves are not used to be eaten alone, but because of their bitterness they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit, which the Malabars and Portugals call Areca, the Gysurates and Decanijns Suparijs. . .” — In Purchas, ii. 1781.

Thus rudely done into English:
 “Thou, Water, stor’st our Wells and Tanks,
 Thou fillest Gunga’s, Jumna’s banks;
 Thou, Water, sendest daily food,
 And fruit and flowers and needful wood;
 Thou, Water, laugh’st, thou, Water,
 weepest;
 Thou, Water, wak’st, thou, Water, sleepest;
 —Father, Mother, in Thee blent,— Hail, O glorious Element!”

Pawnee, Kalla. Hind. Kālā pānī, i.e. ‘Black Water’; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with especial reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it.

1823. “An agent of mine, who was for some days with Cheettoo” (a famous Pindari leader), “told me he raved continually about Kala Panee, and that one of his followers assured him, when the Pindary chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat those dreaded words aloud.” — Sir J. Malcolm, Central India (2d ed.), i. 446.

1833. “Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous non-descript animals.” — MacKintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, 44.

Payen-ghaut, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghaut is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula. From Hind. and Mahr. ghāt, combined with Pers. pānī, ‘below.’

1629-30. “But (‘Azam Khān) found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dhārūr, had the design of descending the Payin-ghat.” — Abdul Hamid Lahorī, in Elliot, vii. 17.

1784. “Peace and friendship . . . between the said Company and the Nabob Tipoo Sultan Bahauder, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travencore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghaut.” — Treaty of Mangalore, in Munro's Narr., 252.

1785. “You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghaut . . . being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith . . . It is known (or understood).” — Letters of Tippoo, p. 12.

Pecul, Pikol, s. Malay and Javanese pikul, 'a man's load.' It is applied as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 katis (see Catty), called by the Chinese themselves shih, and = 133½ lb. avoird.

1554. "And in China anything is sold and bought by cates and picos and taels, provisions as well as all other things."—A. Nunes, 42.

Pedir, n.p. The name of a port and state of the North coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1498. It is named as Pater in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510. "We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Pider . . . In this country there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Molaga . . . in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathai."—Varthema, 238.

1511. "And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Albuquerque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people . . . and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed;—into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me! . . . The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been for a long time noble and great in trade . . . that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security . . . that they were men and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital., 54.

1516. "The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China."—Barbosa, 196.

1538. "Furthermore I told him what course was usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pullo Tiquos and Pullo Quenim, which in time past were carried by the Bataes to Pacem and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Strait of Meegua, and the Ships of Judaa (see Judea) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Cogan), 25.

1553. "After the foundation of Malacca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Pacem began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbour of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Barros, iii. v. 1.

1615. "Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Pedeare 'he did not entreate' anything for Priaman and Tecoe, but only an answer to King James' letter . . ."—Sainsbury, i. 411.

Peeáda. See under Peon.

Peenus, s. i.e. Hind. Pinas. A corruption of Eng. pinnace, a name which is applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Roebuck gives as the marine Hind. for pinnace, p' hineeaz.

Peepul, s. Hind. pīpal, Sansk. pīpāla, Ficus religiosa, L.; one of the great fig-trees of India, which often occupies a prominent place in a village, or near a temple.

The Pīpal has a strong resemblance, in wood and foliage, to some common species of poplar, especially the aspen, and its leaves with their long footstalks quaver like those of that tree.* It is possible therefore that the name is identical with that of the poplar. Nothing would be more natural than that the Aryan immigrants, on first seeing this Indian tree, should give it the name of the poplar which they had known in more northern latitudes (popul-us, pappel, &c.). Indeed, in Kumāon, a true sp. of poplar (Populus ciliatu) is called by the people gar-pīpal (qu. ghar, or 'house'-peepul?). Dr. Stewart also says of this Populus: "This tree grows to a large size, occasionally reaching 10 feet in girth, and from its leaves resembling those of the pipal . . . is frequently called by that name by plainmen." (Punjab Plants, p. 204). A young peepul was shown to one of the present writers in a garden at Palermo as popolo delle Indie. And the recognized name of the peepul in French books appears to be peuplier d'Inde. Col. Tod notices the resemblance (Rajasthan, i. 80), and it appears that Vahl called it Ficus populifolia.* In Balfour's Indian Cyclopædia it is called by the same name in translation, 'the poplar-leaved Fig-tree.' We adduce these facts the more copiously perhaps because the suggestion of the identity of the names pippala and populus was somewhat scornfully rejected by a very learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below.

c. 1550. "His soul quivered like a pipal leaf."—Ramāyana of Tulsi Dās, by Grouse (1878), ii. 25.

1806. "Au sortir du village un pipal élève sa tête majestueuse . . . Sa nombreuse postérité l'entoure au loin sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de géans qui entrelacent fraternellement leurs bras informes."—Haafner, i. 149.

This writer seems to mean a banyan. The peepul does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817. "In the second ordeal, an excavation in the ground . . . is filled with a fire of pippal wood, into which the party must walk barefoot, proving his guilt if he is burned; his innocence, if he escapes unhurt."—Müll (quoting from Halhed), ed. 1830, i. 280.

1826. "A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepul-tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, I could not well make out what."—Pandurang Harī, 27.

1836. "It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepul tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country."—Letter from Court of China to Court of Ava. See Mission to Ava, p. 265.

Peer, s. Pir, a Mahomedan Saint or Beatus. But the word is used elliptically for the tombs of such personages, the circumstance pertaining to them which chiefly creates notoriety or fame of sanctity; and it may be remarked that Wali (or Wely as it is often written), Imāmzāda, Shaikh, and Marabout (see under Adjutant), are often used in the same elliptical way in Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Barbary respectively. We may add that Nabi (Prophet) is used in the same fashion.

1665. "On the other side was the Garden and the chambers of the Mullahs, who with great conveniency and delight spend their lives there under the shadow of the miraculous Sanctity of this Pire, which they are not wanting to celebrate: But as I am always very unhappy on such occasions, he did no Miracle that day upon any of the sick."—Bernier, 133.

1673. "Hard by this is a Peor, or Burying place of one of the Prophets, being a goodly monument."—Fryer, 240.

The following are examples of the parallel use of the other words named:

much from an actual visit to Palestine as the lofty peaked eminence which fills up the north-west corner of the table-land. . . . At present it bears the name of Nebi-Samuel, which is derived from the Mussulman tradition—now perpetuated by a mosque and tomb—that here lies buried the prophet Samuel.”—Stanley's Palestine, 165.

Pegu, n. p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irawadi, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Bagó. This name belongs to the Talaing language, and is popularly alleged to mean ‘conquered by stratagem,’ to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegu, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paigü. The first European mention that we know is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Poggio has Latinized it as Pauco-nia; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1469) the exact Malay form Paigu. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronimo di S. Stefano (1499). The Roteiro of Vasco da Gama (1498) has Pegão, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kāfir by his Mohammedan informants (see under Caffer). Varthema (1510) has Pego, and Giov. da Empoli (1514) Pecu; Barbosa (1516) again Paygu; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

rice, for the value of which the owners of the ships bound themselves.”—Correa, i. 611.

1514. “Then there is Pecü, which is a populous and noble city, abounding in men and in horses, where are the true mines of linoni (?)* and perfect rubies, and these in great plenty; they are fine men, tall and well limbed and stout; as of a race of giants. . . .”—Empoli, 80.

1541. See Bagou in F. M. Pinto under Peking.

1542. “. . . and for all the goods which came from any other ports and places, viz. from Pegu to the said Port of Malacca, from the Island of Çamatra and from within the Straits. . . .”—Titolo of the Fortress and City of Malacca, in Tombo, p. 105 in Subsidios.

1568. “Concludo che non è in terra Re di possäza maggiore del Re di Pegü, per ciòche ha sotto di se venti Re di corona.”—Ces. Federici, in Ramus., iii. 394.

“Olha o reino Arração, olha o assento De Pegü, que já monstros povoaram, Monstros filhos do feo ajuntamento D'hum mulher e hum cão, que sos se acharam.” Camões, x. 122.

By Burton:

“Arracan-realm behold, behold the seat of Pegu peopled by a monster-brood; monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of whelp and woman in the lonely wood. . . .”

1597. “. . . I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegü nor yet from that of Achin (do Dachem); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dachem since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense.”—Despatch from the King to Goa, 5th Feb. In Arquivo Port. Orient., Fascic. iii.

Pegu Ponies. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu commonly imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.

1880. “For sale . . . also Bubble and Squeak, bay Pegues.”—Madras Mail, Feb. 19th.

Peking, n. p. This name means ‘North-Court,’ and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they dethroned the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kublai (1368) they removed the capital from Taitu or

Khānbāligh (Cambaluc of Polo) to the great city on the Yangtsze which has been since known as Nan-King or 'South-Court.' But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1520. "Thomé Pires, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanquij, at its chief city called by the same name, where the King dwelt, and spent in coming thither always travelling north, four months; by which you may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentile Prince. He sent word to Thomé Pires that he was to wait for him at Pequij, where he would despatch his affair. This city is in another province so called, much further north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars. . . ."—Barros, III. vi. 1.

1541. "This City of Pequin. . . is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it. . . . For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantinople, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Sevill, or Lisbon. . . . Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like to Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tauris in Persia, Amadaba (Amadabad) in Cambaya, Bisnaga(?) in Narsingaa, Goura (Gouro) in Bengala, Ava in Chalen, Timplan in Calaminham, Martaban (Martavão) and Bagou in Pegu, Gvimpel and Tinlau in Siammon, Odia in the Kingdom of Sornau, Passavan and Dema in the Island of Java, Pangor in the Country of the Leguiens (no Lequio) Usangea (Uzagnè) in the Grand Cauchin, Lancama (Lacame) in Tartary, and Meaco (Mioco) in Jappun. . . . for I dare well affirm that all those same are not to be compared to the least part of the wonderful City of Pequin. . ."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 136 (orig. cap. cvii.).

1614. "Richard Cocks writing from Ferando understands there are great cities in the country of Corea, and between that and the sea mighty bogs, so that no man can travel there; but great wagons have been invented to go upon broad flat wheels, under sail as ships do, in which they transport their goods. . . . the deceased Emperor of Japan did pretend to have conveyed a great army in these sailing wagons, to assail the Emperor of China in his City of Paquin."—In Sainsbury, i. 343.

Pelican, s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gagan-bheri, i.e., 'Sheep of the Sky,' which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metathesis convert into the equally appropriate Ganga-bheri or 'Sheep of the Ganges.' The name may be illustrated by the old term 'Cape-sheep' applied to the albatross.* But Pelican is habitually misapplied by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjutant (q.v.) We may remember how Prof. Max Müller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. "The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation."† Now, by an analogous process, it is possible that some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place.

It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only that "some ca'd them paylicans, some ca'd them audjutants."

1829. "This officer . . . on going round the yard (of the military prison) . . . discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said,—'Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.' This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case. The moment the dinner-trumpet sounds, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 25.

Penang, n.p. This is the proper name of the Island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo Pinang), which on its cession to the English (1786) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinang in Malay signifies an areca-nut or areca-tree, and, according to Crawford, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (vulgo, the "betelnut").

1592. "Now the winter (q.v.) coming vpon vs with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Ilands of Pulo Pinaou (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malaian tongue signifieth an Iland) . . . where we came to an anker in a very good harborough betweene three Ilands. . . This place is in 6 degrees and a halfe to the Northward, and some fve leagues from the maine betweene Malacca and Pegu."—Barker, in Hakluyt, ii. 589-590.

Penang Lawyer, s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore. It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala acutifida, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire, and polished (Balfour).

The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that lawsuits in Penang were decided by the lex baculina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang liyar, 'wild areca,' may almost certainly be assumed to be the real name.

1833. (But the book—an excellent one—is without date—more shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it.) "Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' * to defend myself from dogs . . ."—Gilmour, Among the Mongols, 14.

Pengwin, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus. We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, fat. See Littré. He quotes Clusius as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguedine. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert direct from Selden.

1578. "In these Islands we found greate relief and plenty of good victuals, for infinite were the number of fowle which the Welsh men named Pengwin, and Magilanus tearmed them geese. . . ."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc., p. 72.

1593. "The pengwin described."—Hawkins, V. to S. Sea, p. 111, Hak. Soc.

1606. "The Pengwines bee as bigge as our greatest Capons we have in England, they have no winges nor cannot flye they bee exceeding fatte, but their flesh is verie ranke. . . ."—Middleton, i. B. 4.

1609. "Nous trouvâmes beaucoup de Chiés de Mer, et Oyseaux qu'on appelle Penguyns, dont l'Escueil en estait quasi couvert."—Houtman, p. 4.

c. 1610. " . . . le reste est tout couvert . . . d'une quantité d'Oyseaux nommez pinguy, qui font à leurs œufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une quantité si prodigieuse qu'on ne scauroit mettre . . . le pied en quelques endroit que ce soit sans toucher."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 73.

1612. "About the year CIO. C.LXX. Madoc brother to David ap Owen, prince of Wales, made this sea voyage (to Florida); and by probability these names of Capo de Briton in Norumbeg, and Pengwin in part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relics of this discovery."—Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polyolbion, in Works (ed. 1726), iii., col. 1802.

1616. "The Island called Peng-win Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Pen-gwin signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 334.

1638. " . . . that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others, the Records of this Voyage writ by many Bards and Genealogists confirme it . . . made more orthodoxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as . . . Peng-gwyn, refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. . . ."—Herbert, Some Yeares Travels, &c., p. 360.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M.

* "A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Note to the above.

Roulin, quoted by Littré, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view.

Peon, s. This is a Portuguese word peão (Span. peon); from pé, 'foot,' and meaning 'a footman' (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind. piyāda, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of 'a foot-soldier'; thence as 'orderly' or messenger. The word Seppoy was used within our recollection, perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of 'orderly' peon is the word usual in S. India, whilst chuprassy (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise employed very generally for men employed on police service (see Burk-undauze).

The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manoel Correa, an early commentator on the Lusiads (d. 1613), thinks it necessary to explain piões by 'gente de pé.'

1503. "The Camorym ordered the soldier (pião) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 421.

Orders, &c., of Sir Ch. Napier*, p. 72.

1873. “Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer . . . and eventually a pleader before an English Judge in a populous city.”—Saturday Review, May 31, p. 728.

Pepper, s. The original of this word, Sansk. pippali, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce (‘black pepper’) but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have sometimes been classed in a different genus (Chavica) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though, with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he misapprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalimūla, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopœia, is probably the πεπέρος ῥίζα of the ancients (Royle, p. 86).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly via Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Rhio, but a small quantity of fine quality comes from Tellicherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit-spike gathered and dried when not quite ripe.* All these kinds of pepper were (as has been said) known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D. “The cornes or graines . . . lie in certaine little huskes or cods . . . If that be plucked from the tree before they gape and open of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawne by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterwards beeing parched in the Sunne, chaungeth colour and waxeth blacke, and therewith riveled also . . . Long pepper is soone sophisticated, with the senvie or mustard seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fifteen Roman deniers. The white costeth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after foure deniers by the pound.”—Pliny, tr. by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. 80–90. “And there come to these marts great ships, on account of the bulk and quantity of pepper and malabathrum . . . The Pepper is brought (to market) here, being produced largely only in one district near these marts, that which is called Kot-tonarikē.”—Periplus, § 56.

c. A.D. 100. “The Pepper-Tree (πέπερος δένδρον) is related to grow in India; it is short, and the fruit as it first puts it forth is long, resembling pods; and this long pepper has within it (grains) like small millet, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it opens and puts forth a cluster bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for theriacal potencies.”—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 545. “This is the Pepper-tree” (there is a drawing). “Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest tree, for it is weak and slim like the slender stems of the vine. And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of rue.”—Cosmas, Book xi.

c. 870. "The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit."—Ibn Khurdādhba, in Journ. As., Ser. vi., tom. v., 284.

1166. "The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the towns, and every one knows his plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, but when they collect it they put it into basons and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried . . . in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour."—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright, p. 114.

c. 1330. "L'albore che fa il pepe è fatto come l'elera che nasce su per gli muri. Questo pepe sale su per gli arbori che l'uomini piantano a modo de l'elera, e sale sopra tutti li arbori più alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell'uve; . . . ematuro si lo vendemiano a modo de l'uve e poi pongono il pepe al sole a seccare come uve passe, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe."—Odoric, in Cathay, App. xviii.

Pergunnah, s. Hind. pargana, a subdivision of a 'District' or Zilla (q. v.).

c. 1500. "The divisions into sūbas and parganas, which are maintained to the present day in the province of Tatta, were made by these people" (the Samma Dynasty).—Tārīkh-i-Tāhīrī, in Elliot, i. 273.

1535. "Item, from the 3 praguanas, viz., Anzor, Cairena, Panchenaa 133,260 feceas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 139.

1812. "A certain number of villages with a society thus organised, formed a pergunnah."—Fifth Report, 16.

Pergunnahs, The Twenty-four, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and inclosing, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original 'Zemindary of Calcutta' granted to the English Company by a 'Subadar's Perwana' in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jagh-hire (q. v.).

The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips's Million of Facts, illustrates the development of "facts" out of the moral consciousness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765. "The lands of the twenty-four Pergunnahs, ceded to the Company by the treaty of 1757, which subsequently became Colonel Clive's jagghier, were rated on the King's books at 2 lac and 22,000 rupees."—Holwell, Hist. Events, 2nd ed., p. 217.

1812. "The number of convicts confined at the six stations of this division (independent of Zillah Twenty-four pergunnahs) is about 4,000. Of them probably nine-tenths are dacoits."—Fifth Report, 559.

c. 1831. "Bengal is divided in 24 Pergunnahs, each with its judge and magistrate, registrar, &c."—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, stereot. ed. 1843, 927.

Peri, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm's Law in the change of initial consonant. The Persian word is parī, from par, 'a feather, or wing'; therefore 'the winged one'; whilst the genealogy of fairy is apparently Ital. fata, French fée, whence féerie ("fay-dom") and thence fairy.

"From cluster'd henna, and from orange groves,
That with such perfumes fill the breeze
As Peris to their Sister bear,
When from the summit of some lofty tree
She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives." Thalaba, vi. 24.

"But nought can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary."
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

Persaim, n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassein (q. v.) in Pegu. It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759. "The Country for 20 miles round Persaim is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of CHOROMANDEL from Pondichery to Malipatam."—Letter in Dalrymple, i. 110. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1754.

1795. "Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy . . . to the Birman Governor of Persaim for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty."—Symes, p. 40.

But this author also uses Bassien (e.g. 32), and "Persaim or Bassien" (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Ensign Wood.

Persimmon, s. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus (D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia.

1878. "The finest fruit of Japan is the Kaki or persimmon (Diospyros Kaki), a large golden fruit on a beautiful tree."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 234.

Perumbaucum, n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjeveram, in the district of Madras.

The name is perhaps perum pākham, 'big village.'

Pescaria, n.p. The Coast of Tinnevely was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl 'fishery' there.

1600. "There are in the Seas of the East three principal mines where they fish pearls . . . The third is between the Isle of Ceylon and Cape Comory, and on this account the Coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramanancor and Manār is called, in part, Pescaria . . ."—Lucena, 80.

1615. "Iam nonnihil de orā Piscariā dicamus quae iam inde a promontorio Camorino in Orientem ad usque brevia Ramanancoridis extenditur, quod haud procul inde celeberrimus, maximus, et copiosissimus toto Oriente Margaritarum piscatus instituitur . . ."—Javric, Thes., i. 445.

1710. "The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Camorin to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first debarkation of this second conquest."—Sousa, Orient. Conquist., i. 122.

Peshawur, n.p. Peshāwar. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kabul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshāwar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Āin, about the middle of the Sūba of Kābul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Āin as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tabakāt-i-Akbari of Nizamu-d-din Ahmad (died 1594-5), in Elliot, we find the name transliterated variously as Peshāwar (v. 448), Parshāwar (293), Parshor (423), Pershor (424). We cannot doubt that the Chinese form Folausha in Fah-hian already expresses the name Parashāwar, or Parshāwar.

c. 400. "From Gandhāra, going south 4 days' journey, we arrive at the country of Fo-lau-sha. In old times Buddha, in company with all his disciples, travelled through this country."—Fah-hian, by Beal, p. 34.

c. 630. "The Kingdom of Kien-to-lo (Gāndhāra) extends about 1000 li from E. to W. and 800 li from S. to N. On the East it adjoins the river Sin (Indus). The capital of this country is called Pu-lu-sha-pu-lo (Purashapūra) . . . The towns and villages are almost deserted . . . There are about a thousand convents, ruined and abandoned; full of wild plants, and presenting only a melancholy solitude. . . ."—Hwen T'sang, Pel. Boud., ii. 104-105.

c. 1001. "On his (Mahmūd's) reaching Purshaur, he pitched his tent outside the city. There he received intelligence of the bold resolve of Jaipāl, the enemy of God, and the King of Hind, to offer opposition."—Al-Utbi, in Elliot, ii. 23.

c. 1020. "The aggregate of these waters forms a large river opposite the city of Parshāwar."—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 47. See also 63.

1059. "The Amīr ordered a letter to be despatched to the minister, telling him 'I have determined to go to Hindustān, and pass the winter in Waihind, and Marmināra, and Barshūr . . .'"—Baihaki, in Elliot, ii. 150.

c. 1220. "Farshābūr. The vulgar pronunciation is Barshāwūr. A large tract between Ghazna and Lahor, famous in the history of the Musulman conquest."—Yā-kūt, in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 418.

1519. "We held a consultation, in which it was resolved to plunder the country of the Aferidī Afghāns, as had been proposed by Sultan Bayezid, to fit up the fort of Fershāwer for the reception of their effects and corn, and to leave a garrison in it."—Baber, 276.

c. 1555. "We came to the city of Purshawar, and having thus fortunately passed the Kotal we reached the town of Joshāya. On the Kotal we saw rhinoceroses, the size of a small elephant."—Sidi 'Alī, in J. As., Ser. i., tom. ix. 201.

c. 1590. "Tumān Bagrām, which they call Parshawar; the spring here is a source of delight. There is in this place a great place of worship which they call Gorkhatrī, to which people, especially Jogis, resort from great distances."—Āin (orig.), i. 592.

1783. "The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted skreen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost inflammable."—G. Forster, ed. 1808, ii. 57.

1863. "Its present name we owe to Akbar, whose fondness for innovation led him to change the ancient Parashāwara, of which he did not know the meaning, to Peshāwar, or the 'frontier town.' Abul Fazl gives both names."—Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 87.

Peshcubz, s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, whilst the edge curves inwardly from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. pēsh-kabz, 'fore-grip.' The handle is usually made of shirmāh, 'the white bone (tooth?) of a large cetacean;' probably morse-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Sainsbury, ii. pp. 65, 159, 204, 305; iii. 89, 162, 268, 287, etc.).

Peshcush, s. Pers. pēsh-kash. Wilson interprets this as literally 'first-fruits.' It is used for an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent, a payment exacted on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary government demand on land.

1673. "Sometimes sending Fishcashes of considerable value."—Fryer, 166.

1675. "Being informed that Mr. Mohun had sent a Piscash of Persian Wine, Cases of Stronge Water, &c. to ye Great Governour of this Country, that is 2d. or 3d. pson in ye kingdome, I went to his house to speake abt. it, when he kept me to dine with him."—Puckle's Diary, MS. in India Office.

1689. "But the Pishcushes or Presents expected by the Nabobs and Omrads retarded our Inlargement for some time notwithstanding."—Ovington, 415.

1761. "I have obtained a promise from his Majesty of his royal confirmation of all your possessions and privileges, provided you pay him a proper pishcush . . . ."—Major Carnac to the Governor and Council, in Van Sittart, i. 119.

1811. "By the fixed or regulated sum . . .

* Gladwin does in his translation; but see above.

. . . . the Sultan . . . means the Paish-cush, or tribute, which he was bound by former treaties to pay to the Government of Poonah; but which he does not think proper to . . . designate by any term denotive of inferiority, which the word Paishcush certainly is."—Kirkpatrick, Note on Tippoo's Letters, p. 9.

Pesh-khāna and Pesh-khidmat, ss. Pers. 'Fore-service.' The tents and accompanying retinue sent on overnight, during a march, to the new camping ground, to receive the master on his arrival. A great personage among the natives, or among ourselves, has a complete double establishment, one portion of which goes thus every night in advance.

1665. "When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps . . . to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design'd to encamp at: And 'tis therefore that they are called Peiche-kanes, as if you should say, Houses going before . . ."—Bernier, 115.

Peshwa, s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Mahratta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Sivaji, became practically the prince of an independent state and chief of the Mahrattas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Baji Rao, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jāgūr under his own jurisdiction, at Bhitūr, near Cawnpore, till January, 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Nānā Sāhib.

Mr. C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshwān: "The princess Gangā Bāi was Peshwān of Purandhar." (MS. notes.)

1673. "He answered, it is well, and referred our Business to Moro Pundit his Peshua, or Chancellour, to examine our Articles, and give an Account what they were."—Fryer, 79.

1803. "But how is it with the Peshwah? He has no minister; no person has influence over him, and he is only guided by his own caprices."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837) ii. 177.

In the following passage (quandoquidem dormitans) the Great Duke had forgotten that things were changed since he left India, whilst the editor perhaps did not know:

1841. "If you should draw more troops from the Establishment of Fort St. George, you will have to place under arms the subsidiary force of the Nizam, the Peishwah, and the force in Mysore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam in 1800-1801."—Letter from the D. of Wellington, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 1874. (Dec. 29th.)

The Duke was oblivious when he spoke of the Peshwa's Subsidiary Force in 1841.

Petersilly, s. This is the name by which 'parsley' is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for 'parsley,' viz., petersilie, from the Lat. petroselinum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French persil. In the Arabic of Avicenna the name is given as fatrasiiliun.

Pettah, s. Tamil, peṭṭai. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The pettah is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Mahratti peṭh is used in like manner. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1630. "Azam Khán, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-dúdh, encamped 3 kos from Dhárúr. He then directed Multafit Khán . . . to make an attack upon . . . Dhárúr and its petta, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling."—Abdul Hamid, in Elliot, vii. 20.

1763. "The pagoda served as a citadel to a large pettah, by which name the people on the Coast of Coromandel call every town contiguous to a fortress."—Orme, i. 147, ed. 1803.

1791. "... The petta or town (at Bangalore) of great extent to the north of the fort, was surrounded by an indifferent rampart and excellent ditch, with an intermediate berm . . . planted with impenetrable and well-grown thorns. . . Neither the fort nor the petta had drawbridges."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, iii. 123.

1803. "The pettah wall was very lofty, and defended by towers, and had no rampart."—Wellington, ii. 193, ed. 1837.

1809. "I passed through a country little cultivated . . . to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a pettah apparently well filled with inhabitants."—Ld. Valentia, i. 412.

1839. "The English ladies told me this Pettah was 'a horrid place—quite native!'

and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native."—Letters from Madras, 289.

Pial, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the veranda, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the N. Indian chabutra (see chabootrah). Wilson conjectures the word to be Telugu, but it is in fact a form of the Portuguese poio and poial (Span. poio), 'a seat or bench.' This is again, according to Diez (i. 326) from the Latin podium, a projecting base, a balcony. Bluteau explains poial as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scottich, 'a louping-on stone'). The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1553. "... paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a poial."—Castanheda, vi. 3.

1578. "In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an infirm man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in its trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a poio."—Acosta, Tractado, 432.

1602. "The natives of this region who are called Iaos, are men so arrogant that they think no others their superiors . . . insomuch that if a Iao in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a poial, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down, . . . until he is gone by, he will kill him."—Couto, IV. iii. 1.

1873. "Built against the front wall of every Hindu house in Southern India . . . is a bench 3 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands . . . The posts of the veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform: for the basement of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Pyal, and is the lounging-place by day. It also serves in the hot months as a couch for the night . . . There the visitor is received; there the bargaining is done; there the beggar plies his trade, and the Yogi sounds his conch; there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with belches and other frightful noises . . ."—Pyal Schools in Madras, by E. C. Gover, in Ind. Antig. ii. 52.

Pice, s. Hind. paisā, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an anna,  $\frac{1}{64}$  of a rupee, or somewhat less than  $\frac{1}{8}$ of a farthing. Pice is used slangishly for money in general.

By Act XXIII. of 1870 (cl. 8) the following copper coins are current:—
1. Double Pice or Half-anna. 2. Pice or  $\frac{1}{2}$  anna. 3. Half-pice or  $\frac{1}{4}$  anna. 4. Pie or  $\frac{1}{16}$  anna. No. 2 is the only one in very common use.

As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucka pice, and cutcha pice (see cutcha and pucka). The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper which did duty for small change (e.g. in the N.W. Provinces within memory), or between single and double Pice, i.e.  $\frac{1}{4}$  anna-pieces and  $\frac{1}{2}$  anna-pieces.

c. 1590. "The Dam . . . is the fortieth part of the rupee. At first this coin was called Faisah."—Ain, 31.

1615. "Pice, which is a Copper Coyne; twelve Drammes make one Pice. The English Shilling, if weight, will yeeld thirtie three Pice and a halfe."—W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1616. "Brasse money, which they call Pices, whereof three or thereabouts countervail a Penny."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

1648. ". . . de Peysen zijn kooper gelt . . ."—Van Twist, 62.

1653. "Pega est vne monnoye du Mogol de la valeur de 6 deniers."—De la Bouillaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1673. "Pice, a sort of Copper Money current among the Poorer sort of People . . . the Company's Accounts are kept in Book-rate Pice, viz. 32 to the Mam. [i.e. Mamoodie, q.v.], and 80 Pice to the Rupee."—Fryer, 205.

1726. "1 Ana makes  $1\frac{1}{2}$  stuyvers or 2 peys."—Valentijn, v. 179.

1768. "Shall I risk my cavalry, which cost 1000 rupees each horse, against your cannon balls that cost two pice?—No.—I will march your troops until their legs become the size of their bodies."—Hyder Ali, Letter to Col. Wood, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 287.

c. 1816. "'Here,' said he, 'is four pucker-pice for Mary to spend in the bazar; but I will thank you, Mrs. Browne, not to let her have any fruit . . .'"—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 16, ed. 1863. Also see Pie.

Picota, s. An additional allowance or per centage, added as a handicap to the weight of goods, which varied with every description,—and which the editor of the Subsidios supposes to have led to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farazolas (see Frazala), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormus), or about  $\frac{1}{3}$  additional; for cinnamon  $\frac{1}{16}$  additional; for benzoin  $\frac{1}{4}$  additional, etc. See the Pesos, &c. of A. Nunes (1554) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.

Picottah, s. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the dhenkū of Upper India, the shūdāf of the Nile, and the old English sweep, swape, or sway-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a 'pump-brake.' The picota at sea was also used as a pillory, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa.

The word is given in the Glossary attached to the "Fifth Report" (1812), but with no indication of its source. Fryer (1673, pub. 1698), describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following the word is used in the marine sense:

1524. "He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday . . . and if he did, that it should be taken from him by the constables (lhe serra tomada polos meirinhos), and the man put in the picota in disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 2, 822.

c. 1780. "Partout les pakotiés, ou puits à bascule, étoient en mouvement pour fournir l'eau nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendoit les jardiniers égayer leurs travaux par des chansons."—Haefner, ii. 217.

1782. "Pour cet effet (arroser les terres) on emploie une machine appelée Picôte. C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits ou d'un réservoir d'eaux pluviales, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite où l'on veut."—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 188.

1807. "In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yatam, or Pacota, as it is called by the English."—Buchanan, Journey through Mysore, &c., i. 15.

Pie. s. Hind. pāṛī, the smallest copper coin of the Anglo-Indian currency, being  $\frac{1}{16}$  of an anna,  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a rupee, = about  $\frac{1}{4}$  a farthing.

This is now the authorised meaning of pie. But pāṛī was originally, it would seem, the fourth part of an anna, and in fact identical with pice, q.v. It is the Mahratti pāṛī, 'a quarter,' from Skt. pad in that sense.

Piece-goods. This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which appears to have been deliberately killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India.*

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such lingering and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of "ancient history." But it is certain that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes: it was killed by prohibitory duties.

These duties were so high in 1788 that they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and they were reduced to 18 per cent. ad valorem.

In the year 1796-97 the value of piece-goods from India imported into England was £2,776,682, or one-third of the whole value of the imports from India, which was £8,252,309. And in the sixteen years between 1798-4 and 1809-10 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £26,171,125.

In 1799 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they were, I believe, at a maximum. The duties then, on "plain white calicoes," were:—

Warehouse duty . . .	4	0	0	per cent.
War enhancement . . .	1	0	0	"
Customs duty . . .	50	0	0	"
Total . . .	67	10	0	per cent. on value.

There was an Excise duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 34d. per square yard, and of twice that amount on foreign (Indian) calico and muslin printed in Great Britain, and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Custom-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 34d. per square yard.

(See in the Statutes, 43 Geo. III. cap. 68, 69, 70; 54 Geo. III. cap. 36; 6 Geo. IV. cap. 3; also Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, iv. 426).

(i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading.

1665. "I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Cloth of all sorts, fine and others, tinged and white, which the Hollanders alone draw from thence and transport into many places, especially into Japan and Europe; not to mention what the English, Portingal and Indian merchants carry away from those parts."—Bernier, E.T., 141.

1785. (Res<sup>a</sup>. of Court of Directors of the E. I. C., 8th October) "... that the Captains and Officers of all ships that shall sail from any part of India, after receiving notice hereof, shall be allowed to bring 8000 pieces of piece-goods and no more... that 5000 pieces and no more, may consist of white Muslins and Calicoes, stitched or plain, or either of them, of which 5000 pieces only 2000 may consist of any of the following sorts, viz., Alliballies, Atrochs (?), Cossacs, Doreas, Jamdannees, Mulmulis, Nainsooks, Neckcloths, Tarjeets, and Terrindams, and that 3000 pieces, and no more, may consist of coloured piece-goods. . . ." &c., &c.—In Seton-Karr, i. 83.

1673. "The Rooms are spread with Carpets as in India, and they have Pigdans, or Spitting Pots of the Earth of this Place, which is valued next to that of China, to void their Spittle in."—Fryer, 223.

Pigeon English. The vile jargon which forms the medium of communication at the Chinese ports between Englishmen who do not speak Chinese, and those Chinese with whom they are in the habit of communicating. The word "business" appears, in this kind of talk, to be corrupted into "pigeon" and hence the name of the jargon is supposed to be taken.

1880. "... the English traders of the early days ... instead of inducing the Chinese to make use of correct words rather than the mishapen syllables they had adopted, encouraged them, by approbation and example, to establish Pigeon English—a grotesque gibberish which would be laughable if it were not almost melancholy."—Capt. W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 156.

1883. "The 'Pidjun English' is revolting, and the most dignified persons demean themselves by speaking it. ... How the whole English-speaking community, without distinction of rank, has come to communicate with the Chinese in this baby talk is extraordinary."—Bird, Golden Chessonese, 37.

Pig-sticking. This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called, among a people delighting more in lofty expression, 'the Chase of the Wild Boar.'

When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the shortcomings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they threw the spear at the boar.

The two last charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the last century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen by the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson's Oriental Field Sports (1807). There is, or perhaps we should say more diffidently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 6½ feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar's charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the armpit like a dragoon's lance. Judging from Elphinstone's statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengal practice originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Qui-his adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

1773. The Hon. R. Lindsay does speak of the "Wild-boar chase;" but he wrote after 35 years in England, and rather eschews Anglo-Indianisms:

"Our weapon consisted only of a short heavy spear, three feet in length, and well poised; the boar being found and un-kennelled by the spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin. . . ."—Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 161.

1807. "When (the hog) begins to slacken, the attack should be commenced by the horseman who may be nearest pushing on to his left side; into which the spear should be thrown, so as to lodge behind the shoulder blade, and about six inches from the backbone."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, p. 9. (Left must mean hog's right.)

This author says that the bamboo shafts were 8 or 9 feet long, but that very short ones had formerly been in use; thus confirming Lindsay.

1816. "We hog-hunt till two, then tiff, and hawk or course till dusk . . . we do not throw our spears in the old way, but poke with spears longer than the common ones, and never part with them."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 311.

1848. "Swankey of the Body-Guard himself, that dangerous youth, and the greatest buck of all the Indian army now on leave, was one day discovered by Major Dobbin, tête-à-tête with Amelia, and describing the sport of pigsticking to her with great humour and eloquence."—Vanity Fair, ii. 288.

1866. "I may be a young pig-sticker, but I am too old a sportsman to make such a mistake as that."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 387.

1873. "Pigsticking may be very good fun . . ."—A True Reformer, ch. i.

1876. "You would perhaps like tiger-hunting or pig-sticking; I saw some of that for a season or two in the East. Everything here is poor stuff after that."—Daniel De Roda, ii. ch. xi.

1878. "In the meantime there was a 'pig-sticking' meet in the neighbouring district."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 140.

Pig-tail, s. This term is often applied to the Chinaman's long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandfathers, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was "long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and Swatow districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day." (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32.)

Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven black hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5), says of the people of Tongking, that "like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat."

1879. "One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinamen in front of him, having knotted their pigtails together for reins."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 288.

Pillau, Pilow, Piláf, &c., s. Pers. palāo or pilāv. A dish, in origin purely Mahomedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklots; and in the Āin-i-Akbari (60), we have one for kīma palāo (kīma = 'hash,') with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing.

It was an odd circumstance, some 30 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pilleau.

1616. "Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hens, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pillaw. As they order it they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

c. 1630. "The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of pelo and candied dried meats."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 138.

1673. "The most admired Dainty whereof they stuff themselves is Pullow, whereof they will fill themselves to the Throat and receive no hurt, it being so well prepared for the Stomach."—Fryer, 399. See also p. 93. At p. 404 he gives a recipe.

1687. "They took up their Mess with their Fingers, as the Moors do their Pillaw, using no Spoons."—Dampier, i. 430.

1689. "Palau, that is Rice boild . . . with Spices intermixt, and a boild Fowl in the middle, is the most common Indian Dish."—Ovington, 397.

1711. "They cannot go to the Price of a Pillow, or boild Fowl and Rice; but the better sort make that their principal Dish."

—Lockyer, 231.

1793. "On a certain day . . . all the Musulman officers belonging to your department shall be entertained at the charge of the Sircar, with a public repast, to consist of Pullao of the first sort."—Select Letters of Tippoo S., App. xlii.

c. 1820.

"And nearer as they came, a genial savour Of certain stews, and roast-meats, and pilaus,

Things which in hungry mortals' eyes find favour."—Don Juan, v. 47.

1848. "'There's a pillau, Joseph, just as you like it, and Papa has brought home the best turbot in Billingsgate.'"—Vanity Fair, i. 20.

Pinang, s. This is the Malay word for Areca, and it is almost always used by the Dutch to indicate that article, and after them by some Continental writers of other nations.

The Chinese word for the same product—pín-lang—is probably, as Bretschneider says, a corruption of the Malay word. See Penang.

1726. "But Shah Sousa gave him (viz. Van der Broek, an envoy to Rajmahal in 1655) good words, and regaled him with Pinang (a great favour), and promised that he should be amply paid for everything."—Valentijn, v. 165.

Pindarry, s. Hind. pinḍārī, pinḍārā, but of which the more original form appears to be Mahr. penḍhārī, a member of a body of plunderers called in that language penḍhār and penḍhārā. The etymology of the word is very obscure. We may discard, as a curious coincidence only, the circumstance observed by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, in the work quoted below (i. p. 37, note) that "Pindara seems to have the same reference to Pandour that Kuzāk has to Cossack." Sir John Malcolm observes that the most popular etymology among the natives ascribed the name to the dissolute habits of the class, leading them to frequent the shops dealing in an intoxicating drink called pinda. (One of the senses of penḍhā, according to Molesworth's Mahr. Dict., is 'a drink for cattle and men, prepared from Holcus sorghum' (see Jowau-ree) 'by steeping it and causing it to ferment'). Sir John adds: 'Kurree Khan' (a famous Pindarry leader) 'told me he had never heard of any other reason for this name; and Major Henley had the etymology confirmed by the most intelligent of the Pindar-ries of whom he inquired' (Central India, 2nd ed., i. 433.) Wilson again considers the most probable derivation to be from the Mahr. penḍhā, but in the sense of a 'bundle of rice-straw,' and hara, 'who takes,' because the name was originally applied to horsemen who hung on to an army, and were employed in collecting forage. We cannot think either of the etymologies very satisfactory.*

The Pindāris seem to have grown up in the wars of the later Mahomedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurangzib; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep below.

During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley's time many of the Pindāri leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sindia and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extending from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Kadapa on the S., and Orissa on the S.E. to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindāris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £250,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindāris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.

The Pinderrehs took Velore, which however was soon retaken. . . . A great caravan, coming from Aurungabad, was totally plundered and everything carried off, by a body of Mharattas, at only 12 coss distance from the imperial camp."—Narrative of a Bondeela Officer, app. to Scott's Tr. of Firishtha's H. of Deccan, ii. 122.

In reference to the Pindarehs, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hydr Naik, by Meer Hassan Ali Khan, 149.

1803. "Depend upon it that no pindaries or straggling horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check, and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1823. "On asking an intelligent old Pindarry, who came to me on the part of Kurreem Khan, the reason of this absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrewd answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the fine virtues and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'"—Sir John Malcolm, Central India, i. 436.

1825. "The name of Pindara is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindoostan by the Mahrattas . . . The designation was applied to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them much the same service as the Cossacks perform for the armies of Russia . . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers . . . The rivers generally became fordable by the close of the Dussera (q.v.). The horses then were shod, and a leader of tried courage and conduct having been chosen as Luhbureea, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Luhbur, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400: the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . . but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common looteas (q.v.), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the luhbur in the best manner they could."—Prinsep, Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions, 1813-1823.

1829. "The person of whom she asked this question said 'Brinjaree' . . . but the lady understood him Pindaree, and the name was quite sufficient. She jumped out of the palanquin, and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees, Pindarees.'"—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 281.

Pine-apple. See Ananas.

Pinjrapole, s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Guzerat, is so called. Guz. pinjrapor or pinjrapol. See Heber, ed. 1844; ii. 120, and Ovington, 300-301; but they do not use the word.

1808. "Every marriage and mercantile transaction amongst them is taxed with a contribution for the Pinjrapole ostensibly."—R. Drummond.

Pintado, s. a. From the Port. A 'painted' (or 'spotted') cloth, i.e. chintz (q.v.) Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

1579. "With cloth of diverse colours, not much unlike our vsual pentadoes."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc., p. 143.

1602-5. ". . . about their loynes a fine Pintadoe."—Scott's Discourse of Iawa, in Purchas, i. 164.

1606. "Heare the Generall deliuered a Letter from the KINGS MAESTIE of ENGLAND, with a fayre standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt, with diuers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hee kindly accepted of."—Middleton's Voyage, E. 3.

1665. "To Woodcott . . . where was a room hung with Pintado, full of figures greate and small, prettily representing sundry trades and occupations of the Indians."—Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 30.

c. 1759. "The chintz and other fine painted goods, will, if the market is not overstocked, find immediate vent, and sell for 100 p. cent."—Letter from Pegu, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 120.

b. A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guinea-fowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chintz. But in fact pinta in Portuguese is 'a spot' or fleck, so that it probably only means 'speckled.' This is the explanation in Bluteau.

Pisachee, Skt. piśāchī, a she-demon, m. piśācha. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil pey. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Piśāchīs were (as in the case of Rakshasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: 'The Piśāchī dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognized in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.'

There is however in the Hindu drama a Piśācha bhāṣhā, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced.

The term piśāchī is also applied to the smaller circular storms, commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v. in Supplement). We do not know where Archdeacon Hare found the Piśāchī to be a white demon. (See below.)

1610. "The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Piśācha-vivāha, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of talismans, incantations, and such like magical practices, and then marries her. Piśach, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name."—The Dabistan, ii. 72.

c. 1780. "Que demandez-vous ? leur criaï-je d'un ton de voix rude. 'Pourquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre ? et d'où vient que ces autres femmes se sont enfuies, comme si j'étois un Péshaseh (esprit malin), ou une bête sauvage qui voultût vous devorer ?'"—Haafner, ii. 287.

1801. "They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Fysachi, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises, in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women."—F. Buchanan's Mysore, iii. 17.

1819. "These demons or peisaches are the usual attendants of Shiva."—Erskine on Elephanta, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans., i. 219.

1827. "As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white frock over her head, I laughingly called her Pisashee, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying out to every one she met, I am the Pisashee, I am the Pisashee. Would she have done so, had she been wrapt in black, and called witch or devil instead ? No: for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour everything."—J. C. Hare, in Guesses at Truth, by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1838, p. 7.

Pisang, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (qq.v.) It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among Germans.

1651. "Les Cottewamiens vendent des fruits, comme du Pisang, etc."—A. Roger, La Porte Ouverte, p. 11.

c. 1785. "Nous arrivâmes au grand village de Colla, où nous vîmes de belles allées de bananiers ou pisang . . ."—Haafner, ii. 85.

Pishpash, s. Apparently a factitious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery.

1834. "They found the Secretary disengaged, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pishpash on the other, can be called disengaged."—The Baboo, &c., i. 85.

Pitarrah, s. A coffer or box used in travelling by palankin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a banghy (q.v.). Hind. piṭrā or peṭrā. The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

1849. "The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting their *pitara*hs and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. 'My dear Sir,' was the reply, 'we are quite safe; we have nothing.'"—Delhi Gazette, 7th Nov.

1853. "It was very soon settled that Oakfield was to send to the dāk bungalow for his *petara*hs, and stay with Staunton for about three weeks."—Oakfield, by W. D. Arnold, i. 223.

Plantain, s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisiaca or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite.

The botanical name Musa represents the Arabic mauz, and that again is from the Skt. mocha. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisiaca is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated, by the Mahomedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix. Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or 'Fig of Paradise,' or sometimes 'Fig of India.' The Portuguese also habitually called it 'Indian Fig.' And this perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus Indica of Pliny, as of modern botanists) the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that ficus.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira.

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platano, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516.* That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platanus described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the ananas in the Old World of Asia. It would seem from the translation of Mendoza that in his time (1585) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantan and plantain. But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey's Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of Latin plantago, the field-weed known by the former name.

saporis, mollia, in ore cito dissolubilia: per transversum quotiescumque ipsa incidendis invenies Crucifixum . . . diu non durant, unde per mare ad nostras partes duci non possunt incorrupta."—Gul. de Boldensele.

c. 1350. "Sunt enim in orto illo Adae de Seyllano primo musae, quas incolae ficus vocant . . . et istud vidimus oculis nostris quod ubicunque inciditur per transversum, in utraque parte incisurae videtur ymago hominis crucifixi . . . et de istis foliis ficus Adam et Eva fecerunt sibi perizomata. . ."—John de Marignolli (see Cathay, &c., p. 352).

1384. "And there is again a fruit which many people assert to be that regarding which our first father Adam sinned, and this fruit they call Muse . . . in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you divide it anyway, whether lengthways or across, or cut it as you will, you shall see inside, as it were, the image of the Crucifix; and of this we comrades many times made proof."—Viaggio di Simone Sigoli (Firenze, 1862, p. 160).

1526—tr. 1577. "There are also certayne plantes whiche the Christians call Platani. In the myddest of the plant, in the highest part thereof, there groweth a cluster with fourtie or fiftie platans about it. . . . This cluster ought to be taken from the plant, when any one of the platans begins to appeare yelow, at which time they take it, and hang it in their houses, where all the cluster waxeth rype, with all his platans."—Oviedo, transl. in Eden's Hist. of Travayle, f. 208.

1552 (tr. 1582). "Moreover the Ilande (of Mombas) is verye pleasaunt, having many orchards, wherein are planted and are groweing. . . . Figges of the Indias. . ."—Castañeda, by N. L., f. 22.

1579. ". . . a fruit which they call Figio (Magellane calls it a figge of a span long, but it is no other than that which the Spaniards and Portingalls have named Plantanes)."—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc., p. 142.

1585 (tr. 1588). "There are mountaines very thicke of orange trees, siders [i.e. cedras, 'citrons'] limes, plantanos, and palmas."—Mendoza, by R. Parke (Hak. Soc.), ii. 380.

1588. "Our Generall made their wiues to fetch vs Plantans, Lymmons, and Oranges, Fine-apples, and other fruits."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candlish, in Purchas, i. 64.

1588 (tr. 1604). ". . . the first that shall be needefulle to treat of is the Plantain (Platano), or Plantano, as the vulgar call it. . . . The reason why the Spaniards call it platano (for the Indians had no such name), was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some fruites prunes, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castille. The thing wherein was most resemblance, in my opinion, between the plantanos at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatest of the leaves. . . . But, in truth, there is no more comparison nor resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverb saith, betwixt an egge and a chesnut."—Joseph de Acosta, transi. by E. G. (Hak. Soc. i. 241).

1593. "The plantane is a tree found in most parts of Afrique and America, of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe."—Hawkins, Voyage into the South Sea, Hak. Soc., 49.

1610. "... and every day failed not to send each man, being one and fiftie in number, two cakes of white bread, and a quantitie of Dates and Plantans. . . ."—Sir H. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 254.

c. 1610. "Ces Gentils ayant pitié de moy, il y eut vne femme qui me mit . . . vne seruiete de feuilles de plantane accomodées ensemble avec des espinas, puis me ietta dessus du rys cuit avec vne certaine sauce qu'ils appellent caril. . . ."—Mocquet, Voyages, 292.

1616. "They have to these another fruit we English there call a Planten, of which many of them grow in Clusters together . . . very yellow when they are Ripe, and then they taste like unto a Norwich Pear, but much better."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 360.

". . . with candy Plantains and the juicy Pine,
On choicest Melons and sweet Grapes they dine,
And with Potatoes fat their wanton Swine."
Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

"Oh how I long my careless Limbs to lay
Under the Plantain's Shade; and all the Day
With amorous Airs my Fancy entertain."
Ibid.

c. 1660.
"The Plant (at Brasil Bacone call'd) the Name
Of the Eastern Plane-tree takes, but not the same:
Bears leaves so large, one single Leaf can shade
The Swain that is beneath her Covert laid;
Under whose verdant Leaves fair Apples grow,
Sometimes two Hundred on a single Bough. . . ."

Cowley, Of Plants, Bk. v.

1673. "Lower than these, but with a Leaf far broader, stands the curious Plantan, loading its tender Body with a Fruit, whose clusters emulate the Grapes of Canaan, which burthened two men's shoulders."—Fryer, 19.

1686. "The Plantain I take to be King of all Fruit, not except the Coco itself."—Dampier, i. 311.

1689. "... and now in the Governour's Garden (at St. Helena) and some others of the Island are quantities of Plantins, Bonanoes, and other delightful Fruits brought from the East." . . .—Ovington, 100.

"But round the upland huts, bananas plant;
A wholesome nutriment bananas yield,
And sunburnt labour loves its breezy shade,
Their graceful screen let kindred plantanes join,
And with their broad vans shiver in the breeze."

1805. "The plantain, in some of its kinds, supplies the place of bread."—Orme, Fragments, 470.

Poggie, Puggly, &c., s. Properly Hind. pāgal; a madman, an idiot; often used colloquially by Anglo-Indians. A friend belonging to that body used to adduce a macaronic adage which we fear the non-Indian will fail to appreciate: "Pāgal et pecunia jaldē separantur!" 1829. "It's true the people call me, I know not why, the pugley."—Mem. John Shipp, ii. 255.

1866. "I was foolish enough to pay these budmashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over. I must have been a paugul to do it."—The Dak Bungalow, 385.

Poison-nut, s. Strychnos nux vomica, L.

Polea, s. Mal<sup>m</sup>. pulayan, a person of low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance. From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs empolear-se, 'to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,' and desempolear-se, 'to purify oneself after such pollution' (Gouvea, f. 97, and Synod. f. 52 v), superstitions which Menezes found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar.

1510. "The fifth class are called Poliar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts . . . the Poliar may not approach either the Naeri or the Brahmins within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them. . . ."—Varthema, 142.

1516. "There is another lower sect of gentiles called puler. . . . They do not speak to the nairs except from a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice. . . . And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing. . . ."—Barbosa, 143.

"A ley, da gente toda, ricca e pobre,
De fabulas composta se imagina:

Andão nus, e somente hum pano cobre
As partes que a cubrir natura ensina.
Dous modos ha de gente ; por que a nobre
Nayres chamados são, e a minos dina
Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga
A ley não misturar a casta antiga.”

Camões, vii. 37.

By Burton :

“The Law that holds the people, high and low, is fraught with false phantastick tales long past :
they go unclouthed, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist :

Two modes of men are known : the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower caste

Poléas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain. . . .”

1598. “When the Portingales came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayros desired that men should give them place, and turne out of the Way, when they mette in the Streetes, as the Polyas . . .” (used to do).—Einschoten, 78.

1606. “. . . he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Poleaa, which is one of the lowest castes of Malauar.”—Gouvea, f. 76.

1626. “These Puler are Theeves and Sorcerers.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

1754. Ives has “Pullies.”—26.

1770. “Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariahs) are called Pouliats.”—Raynal, Eng. Tr. 1798, i. 6.

1865. “Further south in India we find polyandry among . . . Poleres of Malabar.”—McLennan, Primitive Marriage, 179.

Poligar, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days ; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the higher use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tamil, pālaiyakkāran, ‘the holder of a pālaiyam,’ or feudal estate ; Telugu, pālegādu ; and thence Mahr. pālegār ; the English form being taken no doubt from one of the two latter.

The southern Poligars gave much trouble from 80 to 100 years ago, and the “Poligar wars” were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Pānjālamkurichi, one of their forts in Tinnevely, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 15 British officers. Much regarding the Poligars of the south will be found in Nelson’s Madura, and in Bishop Caldwell’s very interesting History of Tinnevely.

Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Mahratta boundary.

1681. “They pulled down the Polegar’s houses, who, being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself.”—Wheeler, i. 118.

1701. “Le lendemain je me rendis à Tailur, c’est une petite ville qui appartient à un autre Paleagaren.”—Lettres Édifiantes, x. 269.

1745. “J’espère que Votre Eminence agréera l’établissement d’une nouvelle Mission près des Montagnes appellées vulgairement des Palleagares, où aucun Missionnaire n’avait paru jusqu’à présent. Cette contrée est soumise à divers petits Rois appellés également Palleagars, qui sont independans du Grand Mogul quoique placés presque au milieu de son Empire.”—Norbert, Mém., ii. 406-7.

1754. “A Polygar . . . undertook to conduct them through defiles and passes known to very few except himself.”—Orme, i. 373.

1780. “He (Hyder) now moved towards the pass of Changana, and encamped upon his side of it, and sent ten thousand polygars to clear away the pass, and make a road sufficient to enable his artillery and stores to pass through.”—Hon. James Lindsay in Lives of the L.’s, iii. 233.

“The matchlock men are generally accompanied by poligars, a set of fellows that are almost savage, and make use of no other weapon than a pointed bamboo spear, 18 or 20 feet long.”—Munro’s Narrative, 131.

1783. “To Mahomet Ali they twice sold the Kingdom of Tanjore. To the same Mahomet Ali they sold at least twelve sovereign Princes called the Polygars.”—Burke’s Speech on Fox’s India Bill, in Works, iii. 458.

1801. “The southern Poligars, a race of rude warriors habituated to arms of independence, had been but lately subdued. . .” —Welsh, i. 57.

1809. “Tondiman is an hereditary title . . . His subjects are Polygars, and since the late war . . . he is become the chief of those tribes, among whom the singular law exists of the female inheriting the sovereignty in preference to the male.”—Id. Valentia, i. 364.

1868. “There were 72 bastions to the fort of Madura ; and each of them was now formally placed in charge of a particular chief, who was bound for himself and his heirs to keep his post at all times, and under all circumstances. He was also bound to pay a fixed annual tribute ; to supply and keep in readiness a quota of troops for the Governor’s armies ; and to keep the Governor’s peace over a particular tract of country. . . . A grant was made to him of a tract of country . . . together with the title of Pāleiya Kāraṇ (Poligar). . . .”—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii., p. 99.

1868. “Some of the Poligars were placed in authority over others, and in time of war were amenable for the good conduct of their subordinates. Thus the Sethupati was chief of them all; and the Poligar of Dindigul is constantly spoken of as being the chief of eighteen Poligars . . . when the levying of troops was required the Delavay (see Dalaway) sent requisitions to such and such Poligars to furnish so many armed men within a certain time. . . .”—Id., p. 157.

The word got transferred in English parlance to the people under such Chiefs (see quotations above, 1780–1809); and especially, it would seem, to those whose habits were predatory:

1869. “There is a third well-defined race mixed with the general population, to which a common origin may probably be assigned. I mean the predatory classes. In the south they are called Poligars, and consist of the tribes of Marawars, Kallars (see Colleery), Bedars, Ramuses (see Ramooses); and in the North are represented by the Kolis of Guzerat, and the Gujars (see Coolce and Goojer) of the N.W. Provinces.”—Sir Walter Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. L., N. S., i. 112.

Pollam, s. Tam. pālāiyam; Telugu, pāḷemu; see under Poligar.

1783. “The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the poligars was that the weavers were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warmed in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection.”—Burke's Speech on Fox's E. I. Bill, in Works, iii. 488.

1795. “Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Poligars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. . . .”—Report on Dindigul, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson's Madura, Pt. IV., p. 15.

Polo, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game.

The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in varied forms) from Provence to the borders of China (see Chicane). It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himalaya, viz. at Manipūr in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Ladāk,* Balti, Astōr and Gilgit, and extending into Chitrāl). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmīr, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July, 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phoenix Park. The next year it was played in many places.† But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-bridge, 11th July, 1874, in the next day's paper.

There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1872, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo racket, just as it is described by Jo. Cinnamus in the extract under Chicane (supra, p. 147), has survived there.

1835. “The ponies of Muneepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants. . . . The national game of Hockey, which is played by every male of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all expert equestrians; and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Muneepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmahs, but to save the whole country . . . and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawatee.”—Femberton's Report on the E. Frontier of Br. India, 31–32.

1838. “At Shighur I first saw the game of the Chaghan, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. . . . It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibeti 'Pulu.' . . . I can conceive that the Chaughan requires only to be seen to be played. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation. . . . The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries . . . . Ladakh, Yessen, Chitral, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrome at Bayswater. . . ."—Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, Ladakh, Iskardo, &c. (1842), ii. 289-292.

1848. "An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iskardo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. . . . I was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the chaugan, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigne as hocky on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Balti, often surrounded by rows of beautiful willow and poplar trees."—Dr. T. Thomson, Himalaya and Tibet, 260-261.

I leave all these delights."
Browning, Inn Album, 23.

Pollock-saug, s. Hind. pālāk, pālāk-sāg; a poor vegetable, called also 'country spinach' (Beta vulgaris, or B. Bengalensis, Roxb.)

Polonga, also Tic-polonga, s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bungarus? or Daboia elegans?); Singh. polongarā.

1681. "There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattle. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about five or six feet long."—Knox, 29.

1825. "There are only four snakes ascertained to be poisonous; the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tic polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Heber, in H.'s Journal, ed. 1844, ii. 167.

Pomfret, Pomphret, s. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reduceable to Stromateus stensis, 'the white Pomfret,' Str. cinereus, which is, when immature 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.' The French of Pondicherry call the fish pamplé. We cannot connect it with the πομπιδος of Aelian (xv. 23) and Athenæus (Lib. vii. cap. xviii. seqq.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Naucratus ductor of Day).

The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pampano, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

1727. "Between Cunnaca and Ballasore Rivers . . . a very delicious Fish called the Pamplée, come in Shoals, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—A. Ham., i. 396.

"Another face look'd broad and bland,
Like pamplet floundering on the sand;
Whene'er she turned her piercing stare,
She seemed alert to spring in air."
Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, 201.

1813. "The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of more delicate flavour; and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 52-53.

1874. "The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rev., 30th May, 690.

Pommelo, Pampelmoose, &c., s. Citrus decumana, L., the largest of the orange tribe. It is the same fruit as the Shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommelo seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as "the Forbidden Fruit." The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Batawī nambu (i.e., Citrus Bataviana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ān. According to Bretschneider the Pommelo is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomo-melone?) Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Tavernier calls it pompone (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24), but the usual French name is pampel-mousse. Dampier has Pumple-nose (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pumplemuse (51); Forrest, Pummel-nose (32); Ives, 'Pimplenoses, called in the West Indies Chadocks.' Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompleon is a form unknown to us, but given in the Eng. Cyclopædia. Molesworth's Marathi Dict. gives "papannas, papannas or papanis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littre says boldly, "Tamoul, bambolinas." Ainslie (Mat. Medica, 1813) gives Poomlimas as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cycl. of India) gives Pumpalimas and Bambulimas as Tamil, Bombartimasa and Pampara panasa as Telugu, Bambali naringi (?) as Malayalim. But if these are real words they appear to be corruptions of some foreign term.

Pondicherry, n. p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Pudu-ch'chêri, 'New Town,' more correctly Pudu-var. C. P. Brown however says it is Pudi-cherû, 'New tank.' The natives sometimes write it Phulcheri.

1711. "The French and Danes likewise hire them (Portuguese) at Pont de Chere and Trincombar."—Lockyer, 286.

1718. "The Fifth Day we reached Budulscheri, a French Town, and the chief Seat of their Missionaries in India."—Prop. of the Gospel, p. 42.

1726. "Poedechery," in Valentijn, Choro., 11.

1727. "Punticherry is the next Place of Note on this Coast, a colony settled by the French."—A. Ham., i. 356.

1780. "An English officer of rank, General Coote, who was unequalled among his compeers in ability and experience in war, and who had frequently fought with the French of Phoolcheri in the Karnatic and . . . had as often gained the victory over them. . . ."—H. of Hyder Naik, 413.

Pongol, s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tamil, pōngāl, 'boiling'; i.e., of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover in the J. R. As. Soc., N. S. v. 91, but the connexion which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted.

1651. ". . . nous parlerons maintenant

du Pongol, qui se celebre le 9 de Janvier en l'honneur du Soleil. . . . Ils cuisent du ris avec du lait. . . . Ce ris se cuit hors la maison, afin que le Soleil puisse luire dessus . . . et quand ils voyent, qu'il semble le vouloir retirer, ils crient d'une voix intelligible, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol. . . . —Abt. Roger, Fr. Tr. 1670, pp. 237-8.

1871. "Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The files of the Munsif's Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. . . . The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed 'till after Pongol!'—Gover, as above, p. 96.

Pooja, s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pūja; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus jhinda kā pūja, or 'Pooja of the Flag,' is the Sepoy term for what in St. James's Park is called 'Trooping the colours.'

1826. "The person whose steps I had been watching now approached the sacred tree, and having performed pūja to a stone deity at its foot, proceeded to unumuffle himself from its shawls."—Pandurang Hari, 26.

1866. "Yes, Sahib, I Christian boy. Plenty poojah do. Sunday time never no work do."—The Darok Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 226.

1874. "The mass of the ryots who form the population of the village are too poor to have a family deity. They are forced to be content with . . . the annual pūjahs performed . . . on behalf of the village community."—Cal. Rev., No. cxvii. 195.

1879. "Among the curiosities of these lower galleries are little models of costumes and country scenes, among them a grand pooja under a tree."—Sat. Rev., No. 1251, p. 477.

Poojaree, s. Hind. pūjārī. An officiating priest in an idol-temple.

1702. "L'office de poujari ou de Prêtresse de la Reine mère était incompatible avec le titre de servante du Seigneur."—Lett. Edif., xi. 111.

Pool, s. Pers. Hind. pul, a bridge. Used in two of the quotations under next article for 'embankment.'

Poolbundy, s. P.—H.—pulbandī. 'Securing of bridges or embankments.' A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

1786. "That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan . . . had delivered it as their opinion. . . ."—Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 98.

1802. "The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of poolbundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which call aloud for a remedy."—Fifth Report, Ap. p. 558.

1810. ". . . the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the pool bandy, maintained at a very great and regular expense."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 365.

Poon, Peon, &c., s. Canarese, ponne. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly much used for masts, whence also called mast-wood.

1835. "Peon, or Puna . . . the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Corumcul in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foremast for the Leander, 60-gun ship, in one piece, for 1300 Rupees."—Edye, in J. R. As. Soc., ii. 354.

Poonamalee, n. p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chengleput Dist. of Madras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Pūnamallu (?), and Ponda malāi, whilst Col. Branfill gives it as "Pāntha malli for Pāwirunthamalli," without further explanation.

Poongee, Phoongy, s. The name most commonly given to the Buddhist religieux in British Burma. The word (p'hun-gyi) signifies 'great glory.'

1782. ". . . leurs Prêtres . . . sont moins instruits que les Brame, et portent le nom de Ponguis."—Sonnerat, ii. 301.

1795. "From the many convents in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, the number of Rahans and Phonghis must be very considerable; I was told it exceeded 1500."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 210.

1834. "The Talapoins are called by the Burmese Phonghis, which term means great glory, or Rahans, which means perfect."—Bp. Bigandet, in J. Ind. Archip., iv. 222-3.

Poorāna, s. Skt. purāṇa, 'old'; hence 'legendary,' and thus applied as a common name to 18 books which contain the legendary mythology of the Brahmans.

1612. ". . . These books are divided into bodies, members, and joints (cortos, membros, e articulos) . . . six which they call Xastra, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purana, which are the members; twenty-eight called Agamon, which are the joints."—Couto, Dec. V., liv. vi., cap. 3.

1651. "As their Poranas, i.e. old histories, relate."—Rogerius, 153.

c. 1760. "Le puran comprend dix-huit livres qui renferment l'histoire sacrée, qui contient les dogmes de la religion des Bramines."—Encyclopédie, xxvii. 807.

1806. "Ceux-ci, calculoient tout haut de mémoire tandis que d'autres, plus avancés, lisoient d'un ton chantant, leurs Pourans."—Haafner, i. 130.

Poorub, and Poorbeea, ss. Hind. pārāb, pārūb, 'the East,' from Skt. pārva or pārba, 'in front of,' as pāścha (Hind. pachham) means 'behind' or 'westerly' and dakshina, 'right-hand' or southerly. In Upper India the term means usually Oudh, the Benares division, and Behar. Hence Poorbeea (pārbiya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepoy, the majority being recruited in those provinces.

1553. "Omavm (Humayun) Patxiah . . . resolved to follow Xerchap (Sher Khan) and try his fortune against him . . . and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamona, where on the West bank of the river there is a city called Canose, one of the chief of the kingdom of Dely. Xerchan was beyond the River in the tract which the natives call Purba. . . ."—Barros, IV. ix. 9.

1616. "Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large provinces within it, Purb and Patan, the one lying on the east, the other on the west side of the river."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 357.

1666. "La Province de Halabas s'appelloit autrefois Purop. . ."—Thevenot, v. 197.

" . . . My lands were taken away, And the Company gave me a pension of just eight annas a day; And the Poorbeahs swaggered about our streets as if they had done it all. . ." Attar Singh loquitur, by 'Sowan,' in an Indian paper, the name and date lost.

c. 1817. "The day after tomorrow will be my lad James Dawson's birthday, and we are to have a puttully-nautch in the evening."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories. 291.

Popper-cake, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same word and thing, though to the former is attributed a Hindi and Mahratti origin pāpar, and to the latter a Tamil one, pappadam, as an abbreviation of paruppu-adam, 'lentil cake.' It is a kind of thin scon or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with assafoetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry. It is not bad, even to a novice.

1814. "They are very fond of a thin cake, or wafer, called popper, made from the flour of oord, or mash . . . highly seasoned with assa-foetida; a salt called popper-khor; and a very hot massaula, compounded of turmeric, black pepper, ginger, garlic, several kinds of warm seeds, and a quantity of the hottest Chili pepper."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 50.

1820. "Papadoms (fine cakes made of gram-flour, and a fine species of alkali, which gives them an agreeable salt taste, and serves the purpose of yeast, making them rise, and become very crisp when fried. . . ."—As. Researches, xiii. 315.

"Paper, the flour of oored (read oorud, Phaseolus Maz), salt, assafoetida, and various spices, made into a paste, rolled as thin as a wafer, and dried in the sun, and when wanted for the table baked crisp. . . ."—T. Coates, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo., iii. 194.

Porca, n. p. (In Imp. Gaz. Porakād.) Properly Purākhādū; a town on the coast of Travancore, formerly a separate State. The Portuguese had a fort here, and the Dutch, in the 17th century, a factory. Fra Paolino (1796) speaks of it as a very populous city full of merchants, Mahomedan, Christian, and Hindu. It is now insignificant.

Porcelain, s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypræidae, or Cowries (q.v.) were called in medieval Italy porcellana and porcelletta, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Mahn (see in Litté sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. s.v.

Cypræidae) that Pig is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell appears to have been used in the middle ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz., to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pigin in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic pige, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skeat, s.v. piggin).

We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelaine from "pour cent années," because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250. Capmany has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1791, he has deranged the whole of the chapters, and this, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether!

"In the XLIVth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelona, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 13th century, there are regulations for the return cargoes of the ships trading with Alexandria . . . In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt . . . cotton in bales and spun, wool de capells (for hats!), porcelanas, alum, elephants' teeth . . ."—Memorias, Hist. de Barcelona, I. Pt. 2, p. 44.

"Et encore voz di qe en ceste province, en une cité qe est apellé Tingui, se font escuelle de porcellaine grant et pitet les plus belles qe l'en peust deviser."—Ibid. 180.

c. 1328. "Audiui quoddam decenas civitates habet sub se imperator ille (Magnus Tartarus) majores quam Tholosa; et ego certè credo quoddam plures habebant homines . . . Alia non sunt quae ego sciam in isto imperio digna relatione, nisi vasa pulcherrima, et nobilissima, atque virtuosas et porseleta."—Jordani Mirabilia, p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

c. 1343. "... ghomerabica, vernice, armoniaco, zaffere, coloquinti, porcellane, mirra, mirabolani . . . si vendono a Vinegia a cento di peso sottile" (i.e. by the cutcha hundredweight).—Pegolotti, Pratica della Mercatura, p. 134.

c. 1440. "... this Cim and Macinn that I haue before named arr ii verie great provinces, thinhabitants whereof arr idolaters, and there make they vessells and disshes of Porcellana."—Giosafa Barbaro, Hak. Soc. 75.

In the next the shells are clearly intended :

1442. "Gabelle di Firenze . . . Porcellette marine, la libra . . . soldi . . . denari 4."—Uzzano, Prat. della Mercatura, p. 23.

1475. "The seaports of Cheen and Machin are also large. Porcelain is made there, and sold by the weight and at a low price."—Nikitin, in India in XV. Cent., 21.

1487. "... le mando lo inventario del presente del Soldano dato a Lorenzo . . . vasi grandi di Porcellana mai più veduti simili ne meglio lavorati . . ."—Letter of P. da Bibbieno to Clar. de' Medici, in Roscoe's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371.

1502. "In questo tempo abrusiorno xxi nave sopra il porto di Calechut ; et de epse hebbe tâte drogare e speciarie che caricho le dicte sei nave. Præterea me ha mandato sei vasi di porzellana eccellitissimi et grâdi : quatro bochali de argento grandi cõ certi altri vasi al modo loro per credentia."—Letter of K. Emanuel, 13.

1516. "They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts, very fine and good, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-snails (? caracoli), and eggshells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to refine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave as a fortune to their children . . ."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. 320 v.

1553. (In China) "The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be, everything being of very fine procelana (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little."—Barros, III. ii. 7.

1554. (After a suggestion of the identity of the vasa murrhina of the ancients) : "Ce nom de Porcelaine est donné à plusieurs coquilles de mer. Et pource qu'un beau Vaisseau d'une coquille de mer ne se pourroit rendre mieux à propos suyuât le nom antique, que de l'appeller de Porcelaine, j'ay pensé que les coquilles polies et luyssantes, ressemblants à Nacre de perles, ont quelque affinité avec la matière des vases de Porcelaine antiques : ioinct aussi que le peuple François nomme les patenostres faictes de gros vignols, patenostres de Porcelaine. Les susdicts vases de Por- celaine sont transparents, et coustent bien cher au Caire, et disent mesmement qu'ilz les apportent des Indes. Mais cela ne me sembla vraysemblable : car on n'en voirroit pas si grande quantité, ne de si grâdes pieces, s'il les falloit apporter de si loing. Vne esguiere, vn pot, ou vn autre vaisseau pour petite qu'elle soit, couste vn ducat : si c'est quelque grâd vase, il coustera d'auantage."—P. Belon, Observations, f. 134.

c. 1560. "And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not bene in China, about where this Porcelane is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of oysters shels, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enformed of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance . . ."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

1615. "If we had in England beds of porcelain such as they have in China,—which porcelain is a kind of plaster buried in the earth, and by length of time congealed and glazed into that substance ; this were an artificial mine, and part of that substance . . ."—Bacon, Argument on Impachment of Waste ; Works, by Spedding, etc., 1859, vii. 528.

c. 1630. "The Bannyans all along the sea-shore pitch their Booths . . . for there they sell Callicoës, China-satten, Porcellainware, scrutores or Cabbincts . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 45.

1726. In a list of the treasures left by Akbar, which is given by Valentijn, we find :

"In Porcelyn, &c., Ropias 2507747."—iv. (Suratte), 217.

1650. "We are not thoroughly resolved concerning Porcellane or China dishes, that according to common belief they are made of earth, which lieth in preparation about an hundred years underground ; for the relations thereof are not only divers but contrary ; and Authors agree not herein . . ."—Sir Thomas Browne, Vulgar Errors, ii. 5.

1880. "Vasella quidem delicatiora et caerulea et venusta, quibus inhaeret nescimus quid elegantiae, porcellana vocantur, quasi (sed nescimus quare) a porcellis. In partibus autem Britanniae quae septentrionem spectant, vocabulo forsan analogo, vasa grossiora et fusca pigs appellant barbari, quasi (sed quare iterum nescimus) a porcis."—Narrischchen und Weitgeholt, Etymol. Universale, s.v. 'Blue China.'—Motto to An Ode in Brown Pig, St. James's Gazette, 17th July.

Portia. s. In S. India the common name of the Thespesia populnea, Lam. (N. O. Malvaceae), a favourite ornamental tree, thriving best near the sea. The word is a corruption of Tamil, Pu-arassu, 'Flower-king.' In Ceylon it is called the Suria, and also the Tulip-tree.

1742. "Le bois sur lequel on les met (les toiles), et celui qu'on employe pour les battre, sont ordinairement de tamarinier, ou d'un autre arbre nommé porchi."—Lett. Édif. xiv. 122.

1860. "Another useful tree, very common in Ceylon, is the Surla, with flowers so like those of a tulip that Europeans know it as the tulip tree. It loves the sea air and saline soils. It is planted all along the avenues and streets in the towns near the coast, where it is equally valued for its shade and the beauty of its yellow flowers, whilst its tough wood is used for carriage-shafts and gun-stocks."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 117.

1861. "It is usual to plant large branches of the portia and banyan trees in such a slovenly manner that there is little probability of the trees thriving or being ornamental."—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens of S. India, 197.

Porto Novo, n. p. A town on the coast of South Arcot, 32 m. S. of Pondicherry. The first mention of it that we have found is in Bocarro, Decada, p. 42 (c. 1613).

The name was perhaps intended to mean 'New Oporto,' rather than 'New Haven,' but we have not found any history of the name.

1718. "At Night we came to a Town called Porta Nova, and in Malabarish Pirenti Potci."*—Propagation of the Gospel, &c., Pt. ii. 41.

1726. "The name of this city (Porto Novo) signifies in Portuguese New Haven, but the Moors call it Mohammed Bender . . . and the Gentoo Perringceente."†—Valentijn, Choromandel, 8.

* i.e. Firangi-pett, or 'Frank-town.'

Pra, Phra, Praw, s. This is a term constantly used in Burma, and familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Sanskrit Śrī. In Burmese the word is written bhūrā, but pronounced (in Arakan) p'hrā, and in modern Burma Proper, with the usual slurring of the r, P'hyā or Pyā. The use of the term is not confined to Burma; it is also used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alabaster; the word is used in the same form Phra among the Shans; and in the form Prea, it would seem, in Camboja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambojan epithets as Prea En and Prea Noreai (Narayana); of the figure of Buddha entering nirvana, as Prea Nippan; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as Prea Kot Melea, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as Prea Ang Reacha Vodey, of various sites of temples as Preacon, Preacan, Prea Pithu, &c. (Voyage d'Exploration, i. 26, 49, 338, 77, 85, 72).

The word p'hrā appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous Alomp'hra (1753-1760), founder of the existing dynasty, and of his son Bodoah-p'hrā (1781-1819). In the former instance the name is, according to Sir A. Phayre, A/aung-p'hrā, i.e. the embryo Buddha, or Bodhisatva. A familiar Siamese example of use is in the Phrā Bāt, or sacred foot-mark of Buddha, a term which represents the Śrī Pada of Ceylon.

The late Professor H. H. Wilson, as will be seen, supposed the word to be a corruption of Skt. prabhu (see Parvoe). But Mr. Alabaster points, under the guidance of the Siamese spelling, rather to Skt. vara, pre-eminent, excellent. This is in Pali varo, "excellent, best, precious, noble" (Chidders). A curious point is that, from the prevalence of the term phrā in all the Indo-Chinese kingdoms, we must conclude that it was, at the time of the introduction of Buddhism into those countries, in predominant use among the Indian or Ceylonese propagators of the new religion. Yet we do not find any evidence of such a use of either prabhu or vara. The former would in Pali be pabbho.

1688. "I know that in the country of Laos the Dignities of Pa-ya and Meuang, and the honourable Epithets of Pra are in use; it may be also that the other terms of Dignity are common to both Nations, as well as the Laws."—De la Loubère, Siam, E. T., 79.

"The Pra-Clang, or by a corruption of the Portuguese, the Barcalon, is the officer, which has the appointment of the Commerce, as well within as without the Kingdom. . . . His name is composed of the Balie word Pra, which I have so often discoursed of, and of the word Clang, which signifies Magazine."—Id. 93.

"Then Sommona-Codom (see Gautama) they call Pra-Boute-Tchaou, which verbatim signifies the Great and Excellent Lord."—Id. 134.

1795. "At noon we reached Meeaday, the personal estate of the Magwoon of Pegue, who is oftener called, from this place, Meeaday Praw, or Lord of Meeaday."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 242.

1855. "The epithet Phra, which occupies so prominent a place in the ceremonial and religious vocabulary of both the Siamese and the Burmese, has been the subject of a good deal of nonsense. It is unfortunate that our Burmese scholars have never (I believe) been Sanskrit scholars, nor vice versa, so that the Palse terms used in Burma have had little elucidation. On the word in question, Professor H. H. Wilson has kindly favoured me with a note: 'Phrā is no doubt a corruption of the Sanskrit Prabhu, a Lord or Master; the h of the aspirate bh is often retained alone, leaving Prahu which becomes Prāh or Phra.'"—Mission to Ava, 61.

"All these readings (of documents at the Court) were intoned in a high recitative, strongly resembling that used in the English cathedral service. And the long-drawn Phya-ā-ā-ā! (My Lord), which terminated each reading, added to the resemblance, as it came in exactly like the Amen of the Liturgy."—Id. 88.

1859. "The word Phra, which so frequently occurs in this work, here appears for the first time; I have to remark that it is probably derived from, or of common origin with, the Pharaoh of antiquity. It is given in the Siamese dictionaries as synonymous with God, ruler, priest, and teacher. It is in fact the word by which sovereignty and sanctity are associated in the popular mind."—Bouring, Kingdom and People of Siam.

1863. "The title of the First King (of Siam) is Phra-Chom-Klao-Yu-Hua and spoken as Phra-Phutthi-Chao-Yu-Hua. . . . His Majesty's nose is styled in the Pali form Phra-Nasa. . . . The Siamese term the (Catholic) missionaries, the Preachers of the Phra-Chao Phu-Sang, i.e. of God the Creator, or the Divine Lord Builder. . . . The Catholic missionaries express 'God' by Phra-Phutthi-Chao. . . . and they explain the eucharist as Phra-Phutthi-Kaya (Kaya = 'Body')"—Bastian, Reise, iii. 109, and 114-115.

1870. "The most excellent Parā, brilliant in his glory, free from all ignorance, beholding Nibbana the end of the migration of the soul, lighted the lamp of the law of the Word."—Rogers, Buddhagosa's Parables, tr. from the Burmese, p. 1.

1871. "Phra is a Siamese word applied to all that is worthy of the highest respect, that is, everything connected with religion and royalty. It may be translated as 'holy.' The Siamese letters p-h-r commonly represent the Sanskrit v-r. I therefore presume the word to be derived from the Sanskrit 'vri'—to choose, or to be chosen,' and 'vra'—better, best, excellent,' the root of ṛṣṭros."—Alabaster, The Wheel of the Law, 164.

Pracrit, s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness.

The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadha, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title "Institutiones Linguae Pracriticae. Scriptis Christianus Lassen. Bonnæ ad Rhenum, 1837."

The term itself is the Sanskrit prākṛita, 'natural, unrefined, vulgar,' etc.

1801. "Sanscrita is the speech of the Celestials, framed in grammatical institutes, Pracrita is similar to it, but manifold as a provincial dialect, and otherwise."—Sanskrit treatise, quoted by Colebrooke in As. Res., vii. 199.

Presidency (and President), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a principal Factory, was in early popular use, though in the charters of the E. I. C. its first occurrence is in 1661 (see Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (i. pp. 297, 298); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr. Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 343).

1623. "Speaking of the Dutch Commander, as well as of the English President, who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandes of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrows."—P. della Valle, ii. 517.

"Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, and is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastel * . . . came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)."—P. della Valle, ii. 501, 502.

1638. "As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Suhaly, they went ashore. . . . The two dayes following were spent in feasting, at which the Commanders of the two Ships treated the President, who afterwards returned to Suratta. . . . During my abode at Suratta, I wanted for no divertisement; for I . . . found company at the Dutch President's, who had his Farms there . . . inasmuch as I could converse with them in their own Language."—Mandelslo, E. T., ed. 1669, p. 19.

"Les Anglois ont bien encore un bureau à Bantam, dans l'Isle de Jaua, mais il a son President particulier, qui ne depend point de celui de Suratta."—Mandelslo, (French ed. 1659) 124.

"A mon retour à Suratta ie trouvoy dans la loge des Anglois plus de cinquante marchands, que le President avoit fait venir de tous les autres Bureaux, pour rendre compte de leur administration, et pour estre presens à ce changement de Gouvernement."—Ibid. 188.

* Thomas Rastall or Rastell went out apparently in 1615, in 1616 is mentioned as a "chief merchant of the fleet at Swally Road" (q.v.), and often later as chief at Surat (see Sainsbury, i. 476, and ii. passim).

1661. "And in case any Person or Persons, being convicted and sentenced by the President and Council of the said Governor and Company, in the said East Indies, their Factors or Agents there, for any Offence by them done, shall appeal from the same, that then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said President and Council, Factor or Agent, to seize upon him or them, and to carry him or them home Prisoners to England."—Letters Patent to the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading with the E. Indies, 3d April.

1702. "... Under the Presidency of the aforesaid Island Bombay."—Charters, p. 323.

1702. "Tuesday 7th April. . . . In the morning a Council . . . afterwards having some Discourse arising among us whether the charge of hiring Calashes, &c., upon Invitations given us from the Shabander or any others to go to their Countrey Houses or upon any other Occasion of diverting our Selves abroad for health, should be charged to our Honble Masters account or not, the President and Mr. Loyd were of opinion to charge the same. . . . But Mr. Rouse, Mr. Ridges, and Mr. Master were of opinion that Batavia being a place of extraordinary charge and Expense in all things, the said Calash hire, &c., ought not to be charged to the Honourable Company's Account."—MS. Records in India Office.

The book containing this is a collocation of fragmentary MS. diaries. But this passage pertains apparently to the proceedings of President Allen Catchpole and his council, belonging to the Factory of Ohusan, from which they were expelled by the Chinese in 1701-2; they stayed some time at Batavia on their way home.

Mr. Catchpole (or Ketchpole) was soon afterwards chief of an English settlement made upon Pulo Condore, off the Cambojan coast. In 1704-5, we read that he reported favourably on the prospects of the settlement, requesting a supply of young writers, to learn the Chinese language, anticipating that the island would soon become an important station for Chinese trade. But Catchpole was himself, about the end of 1705, murdered by certain people of Macassar, who thought he had broken faith with them, and with him all the English but two (see Bruce's Annals, iii. 483-4, 580, 606, and A. Ham. ii. 205). The Pulo Condore enterprise thus came to an end.

1727. "About the year 1674, President

Aungier, a gentleman well qualified for governing, came to the Chair, and leaving Surat to the Management of Deputies, came to Bombay, and rectified many things."—A. Ham. i. 188.

Prickly-heat, s. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimples, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimples," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandalwood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him described as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it.

1665. "The Sun is but just now rising, yet he is intolerable; there is not a Cloud in the Sky, not a breath of Wind; my horses are spent, they have not seen a green Herb since we came out of Lahor; my Indians, for all their black, dry, and hard skin, sink under it. My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, as so many needles."—Bernier, E. T., 125.

1807. "One thing I have forgotten to tell you of—the prickly heat. To give you some notion of its intensity, the placid Lord William (Bentinck) has been found sprawling on a table on his back; and Sir Henry Gwillim, one of the Madras Judges, who is a Welshman, and a fiery Briton in all senses, was discovered by a visitor rolling on his own floor, roaring like a baited bull."—Lord Minto in India, June 29th.

1813. "Among the primary effects of a hot climate (for it can hardly be called a disease) we may notice the prickly heat."—Johnson, Influence of Trop. Climates, 25.

Prickly-pear, s. The popular name, in both E. and W. Indies, of the Opuntia Dillenii, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country.

Undoubtedly however it came from America, wide as has been its spread over southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e.g. in Sicily), it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scouted, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncompromising material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury's Useful Plants of India. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian Opuntia, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent.

There is a good description of the plant and fruit in Oviedo, with a good cut (see Ramusio's Ital. version, bk. viii. ch. xxv). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1515.

Some of the names by which the Opuntia is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of Euphorbia. Thus the Euphorbia Royleana, Bois., is called tsūi, chū, &c.; and the Opuntia is called Kābuli tsūi, Gangi shō, Kanghi chū, &c. Gangi chū is also the name of an Euphorbia sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be E. Nerifolia, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 194-5).

This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain Euphorbias, there is no Euphorbia resembling the Opuntia in form.

The Zakām mentioned in the Āin (Gladwin, 1800, ii. 68), as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless an Euphorbia also. The Opuntia is very common as a hedge plant in cantonments, &c., and it was much used by Tippoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the E. Royleana and the Opuntia are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. The latter is objectionable from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly, both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

1685. "The Prickly-Pear, Bush, or Shrub, of about 4 or 5 foot high, . . . the Fruit at first is green, like the Leaf . . . It is very pleasant in taste, cooling and refreshing; but if a Man eats 15 or 20 of them they will colour his water, making it look like Blood."—Dampier, i. 223 (in W. Indies).

"On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear;

They soon a formidable fence will shoot."

Grainger, Bk. i.

1861. "The use of the prickly pear" (for hedges) "I strongly deprecate; although impenetrable and inexpensive, it conveys an idea of sterility, and is rapidly becoming a nuisance in this country."—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens, 205.

Prome, n.p. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Talaing, properly Brun. The Burmese call it Pyé or (in the Aracanese form in which the r is pronounced) Pré, and Pré-myo ('city').

1545. "When he (the K. of Bramoa) was arrived at the young King's palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of Prom, and during the Ceremony . . . made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up . . . This done he went into a Balcone, which looked on a great Market-place, whither he commanded all the dead children that lay up and down the streets, to be brought, and then causing them to be hacked very small, he gave them, mingled with Bran, Rice, and Herbs, to his Elephants to eat."—Pinto, E. T., 211-212 (orig. clv.).

c. 1609. ". . . this quarrel was hardly ended when a great rumour of arms was heard from a quarter where the Portuguese were still fighting. The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of Pren sent in pursuit of the King of Aracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of Pren were so disheartened at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Bocarro, 142.*

1795. "In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Peagee-nuw, or Prome . . . renowned in Birman history."—Symes, pp. 238-9.

Prow, Parao, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayalam pāru, 'a boat,' and the Island word (common to Malay, Javanese, and most languages of the Archipelago) prāu or prālu. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, "Malay Prow," but Crawford defines it as "a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft."

It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499. "The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parao, well manned, on board which he sent a Naire of his with an errand to the Captains . . ."—Correa, Lendas, I. i. 115.

1510. (At Calicut) "Some other small ships are called Parao, and they are boats of ten paces each, and are all of a piece, and go with oars made of cane, and the mast also is made of cane."—Varthema, 154.

"The other Persian said: 'O Sir, what shall we do?' I replied: 'Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.'"—Id. 269.

1518. "Item; that any one possessing a zambuquo (see Sambuk) or a parao of his own and desiring to go in it may do so with all that belongs to him, first giving notice two days before to the Captain of the City."—Livro dos Privilegios da Cidade de Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient., Fascic. 2, p. 7.

1523. "When Dom Sancho* went into Muar to fight with the fleet of the King of Bintan which was inside the River, there arose a squall which upset all our paraos and lancharas at the bar mouth . . ."—Lembrança de Cousas de India, p. 5.

1582. "Next daye after the Capitaine Generall with all his men being a land, working upon the ship called Berrio, there came in two little Paraos."—Castañeda (transl. by N. L.), f. 62v.

The word also occurs in Gouvea (1606) as parô (f. 27v).

1606. "An howre after this comming a board of the hollanders came a prawe or a canow from Bantam."—Middleton's Voyage, c. 3 (v).

1666. "Con secreto previno Lope de Soarez veinte bateles, y gobernandolo y entrando por un rio, hallaron el peligro de cinco naves y ochenta paraos con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Faria y Sousa, Asia, i. 66.

1673. "They are Owners of several small Proves, of the same make, and Canooses, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Fryer, 20.

Elsewhere (e.g. 57, 59) he has Proes.

1727. "The *Andemane*s had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Fraws, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobareans as they could overcome."—A. Ham. ii. 65.

1868. "On December 13th I went on board a prau bound for the Aru Islands."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 227.

Pucka, adj. Hind. pakkā, 'ripe, mature, cooked;' and hence substantial, thorough, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutchā (q.v.) One of the most common uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

1784. "The House, Cook-room, bottle-cannah, godown, &c., are all pucka-built."—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1824. "A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pucka sheds pointed out the Company's warehouses."—Bp. Heber, ed. 1844, i. 259-60.

1842. "I observe that there are in the town (Dehli) many buildings pucka-built, as it is called in India."—D. of Wellington to Lord Ellenborough, in Indian Adm. of Lord E., p. 306.

1857. "Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are, all of them, pucka trumps."—Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869. ". . . there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pucka houses that are being built."—Report of a Sub-Committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pucka, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1727. "Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Morter, called Fuckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick."—A. Ham. ii. 19.

The word was also sometimes used substantively for "pucka pice" (see under Cutch):

c. 1817. "I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four pucks."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale's) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1788. "Pucka—A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours."

Another habitual application of pucka and cutch distinguishes between two classes of weights or measures. The existence of a twofold weight, the pucka ser and the cutch, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (e.g., see Pegolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pound avoirdupois and pound troy.

1673. "The Maund Pucka at Agra is double as much (as the Surat Maund)."—Fryer, 205.

1760. "Les pacca cosses . . . repondent à une lieue de l'Isle de France."—Lett. Edif. xv. 189.

1803. "If the rice should be sent to Coraygaum, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucka seers for each load."—Wellington Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of appointments held.

1866. "Susan. Well, Miss, I don't wonder you're so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is cutch. Thank goodness, my young man is pucka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee."—The Dawk Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853. "'Well, Jenkyns, any news?' 'Nothing pucka that I know of.'"—Oakfield, ii. 57.

1866. "I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pucka."—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 220.

The word has spread to China:

"Dis pukka sing-song makee show
How smart man make mistake, galow."
Leland, Pagan English Sing-Song, 54.

Puckaul, s. (also Puckaul). Hind. pakhāl, 'a water-carrier.' In N. India the pakhāl is a large water-skin (an entire oxhide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the pakhālī is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. See also Williamson's V. M. (1810), i. 229.

1780. "There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two buccalies to each company: these are two large leathern bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock . . ."—Munro's Narrative, 183.

1804. "It would be a much better arrangement to give the adjutants of corps an allowance of 26 rupees per mensem, to supply 2 puckalie men, and two bullocks with bags, for each company."—Wellington, iii. 509.

1813. "In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags called pacanlies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 140.

1842. "I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckalls' and 'mussucks' by sea to Suez."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ellenborough's Ind. Admin. 219.

Puckerow, v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakrāṇā, 'to cause to be seized,' pakrāo, 'cause him to be seized'; or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb, pakaṇ-āo, 'seize and come,' or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckerow belongs especially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckerow,' i.e., to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native).

The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumbcow, gubbrow, lugow (in Suppt.), &c.

1866. "Fanny, I am cutch no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is pucka to puckero!"—The Dawk Bungalow, 390.

Pudipatan, n. p. The name of a very old seaport of Malabar, which has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakaré of K. Johnston's Royal Atlas. The name is Tamil, Pudu- paṭṭana, 'New City.' Compare true form of Pondicherry.

c. 545. "The most notable places of trade are these . . . and then five marts of Malé from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangaruth, Salopatana, Nalopatana, Pudopatana . . ."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. (see in Cathay, &c., p. clxxviii.).

c. 1342. "Buddfattan, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the betel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 87.

c. 1420. "A quā rursus se diebus viginti terrestri viā confulit ad urbem portumque maritimum nomine Pudifetaneam."—Conti, in Poggio, De Varietate Fortunae.

1516. " . . . And passing those places you come to a river called Pudripatan, in which there is a good place having many Moorish merchants who possess a multitude of ships, and here begins the Kingdom of Calicut."—Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 311v.

See also in Stanley's Barbosa Pudopatani, and in Tokfat-ul-Mujahideen, by Rowlandson, pp. 71, 157, where the name (Budfattan) is misread Budufun.

Puggry, Puggerie, s. Hind. pagri, a turban. The term being often used in Anglo-Indian colloquial for a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and the name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

c. 1200. "Prithirāja . . . wore a pāgari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid toro. In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace."—Chand Bardai, E. T. by Beames, Ind. Ant., i. 282.

1673. "They are distinguished, some according to the consanguinity they claim with Mahomet, as a Siad is akin to that Imposture, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Puckery (or Turbat) . . ."—Fryer, 93.

1689. " . . . with a Puggaree or Turbant upon their Heads."—Ovington, 314.

1871. "They (the Negro Police in Demerara) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, their white puggries framing in their ebony faces."—Jenkins, The Coolie.

Puggy, s. Hind. pagi (not in Shakespear's Dict.), from pag, 'the foot.' A professional tracker; the name of a caste whose business is to track thieves by footmarks and the like.

1879. "Good puggies or trackers should be employed to follow the dacoits during the daytime."—Times of India, Overland Suppt., May 12th, p. 7.

Puhur, Pore, Pyre, &c., s. H. puhar, pahr, from Skt. prahara. 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch' or space of 8 ghaṭis (see Ghurry).

c. 1526. "The natives of Hindostān divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a Gheri; they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a Fahar or watch, which the Persians call a Pās."—Baber, 331.

1633. See Bruton, under Ghurry.

1673. See Fryer, under Gong.

1803. "I have some Jascooses (see in Suppt.) selected by Col. C.'s brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur in fear . . ."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

Pulā, s. In Tamil pīllai, Malayāl. pilla; the title of a superior class of (so-called) Sūdras. In Cochin and Travancore it corresponds with Nāyar (v. Nair). It is granted by the sovereign, and carries exemption from customary manual labour.

1553. " . . . pulas, who are the gentlemen" (fidalgos).—Castanheda, iv. 2.

Pulicat, n. p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of an important Dutch factory. Bp. Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Śāstri gives the proper form as pala-Vēl-kāḍu, 'old Velkāḍu or Verkāḍu,' the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sivaite Tēvāram (see also Valentyne below).

1519. "And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the lac (alacre) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Choromandel by the vessels of Pegu and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Paleacate, which is on the coast of Choromandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Florentine (sic, frolentim) called Pero Escroco, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Choromandel . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1533. "The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Paleacate, which is in the Province of Choromandel and the Kingdom of Bisnaga, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. Thomas was said to be, and when they now arrived at the port of Paleacate the wind was against their going on . . .”—Barros, III. vii. 11.

1726. “Then we come to Palteam Wedam Caddoe, called by us for shortness Pallea-catta, which means in Malabars ‘The old Fortress,’ though most commonly we call it Castle Geldria.”—Valentijn, Chorom. 13.

“The route I took was along the strip of country between Porto Novo and Paleiacatta. This long journey I travelled on foot; and preached in more than a hundred places . . .”—Letter of the Missionary Schultze, July 19, in Notices of Madras, &c., p. 29.

1727. “Policat is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St. George . . . It is strengthened with two Forts, one contains a few Dutch soldiers for a Garrison, the other is commanded by an Officer belonging to the Mogul.”—A. Ham. i. 372.

Pulwah, Pulwar, s. One of the native boats used on the rivers of Bengal, carrying some 12 to 15 tons. H. palwār.

1735. “. . . We observed a boat which had come out of Sambo river, making for Patna: the commandant detached two light pulwaars after her . . .”—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 69.

1780. “Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others; a pulwah for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a paunchway” (q.v.)—Hodges, p. 39.

1824. “The ghât offered a scene of bustle and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many budgerows and pulwars, that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 131.

1860. “The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of neater build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying one of the large kind of boats . . .”—Rural Life in Bengal, p. 7.*

Pulwaun, s. Pers. Hind. pahlwān; a champion; a professed wrestler or man of strength.

1828. “I added a pehlivān or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filed into saws, of a temper as ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jackass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout.”—Hajji Baba in England, i. 15.

* There is a good woodcut of the Pulwār, as well as of other Ganges boats, in this work. The author, an excellent man and faithful artist, Mr. Colesworthy Grant, of Calcutta, died there in 1883.

See under Cowry. The Skt. pañā is “a stake played for a price, a sum” and hence both a coin (whence fanam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1683. “I was this day advised that Mr. Charnock putt off Mr. Ellis’s Cowries at 34 pund to ye Rupee in payment of all ye Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 38 Punds are really bought by him for a Rupee . . .”—Hedges, Oct. 2.

Punch, s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. panj, or Hind. and Mahr. pānch, both meaning ‘five’; because composed of five ingredients, viz., arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of this origin; but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as bātīsī, because it is supposed to contain 32 (‘bātīs’) ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschlied, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: “Vier Elemente Innig gesellt, Bilden das Leben, Bauen die Welt.”

The Greeks also had a “Punch,” πενταπλόα, as is shown in the quotation from Athenæus. Their mixture does not sound inviting. Littré gives the etymology correctly from the Pers. panj, but the 5 elements, à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q.v.) Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-ponjis was adopted as the title of a Miscellany published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below.

c. 210. “On the feast of the Scirha at Athens he (Aristodemus on Findar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called ōschus; and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Sciras. And the winner receives a cup such as is called 'Five-fold,' and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called πενταλόα because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little oil."—Athenaeus, XI. xcii.

1638. "This voyage (Gombroon to Surat) . . . we accomplished in 19 days . . . We drank English beer, Spanish sack, French wine, Indian spirit, and good English water, and made good Palepunzen."*—Mandelslo (Dutch ed. 1658), p. 24.

1659. "Fürs Dritte, Pale bunze getitullret, von halb Wasser, halb Brantwein, dreyssig, vierzig Limonien, deren Körnlein ausgespyet werden, und ein wenig Zucker eingeworfen; wie dem Geschmack so angenehm nicht, also auch der Gesundheit nicht."—Saar, ed. 1672, 60.

c. 1666. "Néanmoins depuis qu'ils (les Anglois) ont donné ordre, aussi bien que les Hollandois, que leurs equipages ne boivent point tant de Bouleponges . . . il n'y a pas tant de maladies, et il ne leur meurt plus tant de monde. Bouleponge est un certain breuvage composé d'arac . . . avec du suc de limons, de l'eau, et un peu de muscade rapée dessus; il est assez agréable au goût, mais c'est la peste du corps et de la santé."—Bernier, ed. 1723, ii. 335 (Eng. Tr., p. 141).

1670. "Doch als men zekere andere drank, die zij Paleponte noemen, daartusschen drinkt, zo word het quaet enigsins geweert."—Andriez, 9. Also at p. 27, "Palepunts."

We find this blunder of the compound word transported again to England, and explained as 'a hard word.'

1674. "Palapuntz, a kind of Indian drink, consisting of Aqua-vitæ, Rose-water, juyce of Citrons and Sugar."—Glossographia, &c., by T. E.

1672. Padre Vincenzo Maria describes the thing, but without a name:

"There are many fruits to which the Hollanders and the English add a certain beverage that they compound of lemon-juice, aqua-vitæ, sugar, and nutmegs, to quench their thirst, and this, in my belief, arguments not a little the evil influence."—Viaggio, p. 103.

1673. "At Nerule is the best Arach or Nepa de Goa, with which the English on this Coast make that enervating Liquor called Paunch (which is Indostan for Five), from Five Ingredients; as the Physicians name their Composition Diapente; or from four things, Diatesaron."—Fryer, 157.

1683. ". . . Our owne people and mariners who are now very numerous, and insolent among us, and (by reason of Punch) every day give disturbance."—Hedges, Oct. 8.

1688. ". . . the soldiers as merry as Punch could make them."—In Wheeler, i. 187.

1689. "Bengal (Arak) is much stronger spirit than that of Goa, tho' both are made use of by the Europeans in making Punch."—Ovington's Voyage, 237-8.

1694. "If any man comes into a victualling house to drink punch, he may demand one quart of good Goa arak, half a pound of sugar, and half a pint of good lime water, and make his own punch . . ."—Order Book of Bombay Govt., quoted by Anderson, p. 281.

1705. "Un bon repas chez les Anglois ne se fait point sans bonne pousse qu'on sert dans un grand vase."—Sieur Lullier, Voy. aux Grandes Indes, 29.

1711. "Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection."—Lockyer, 22.

1724. "Next to Drams, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Repasts of the Tender, Valetudinary, and Studios, than Punch."—G. Cheyne, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 58.

1791. "Dès que l'Anglais eut cessé de manger, le Paria . . . fit un signe à sa femme, qui apporta . . . une grande calasse pleine de punch, qu'elle avoit préparé, pendant le souper, avec de l'eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre . . ."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne, 56.

Punch-house, s. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use.

1671-2. "It is likewise enordered and declared hereby that no Victuallar, Punch-house, or other house of Entertainment shall be permitted to make stoppage at the pay day of their wages . . ."—Rules, in Wheeler, iii. 423.

1688. ". . . at his return to Achen he constantly frequented an English Punch-house, spending his Gold very freely."—Dampier, ii. 134.

"Mrs. Francis, wife to the late Lieutenant Francis killed at Hoogly by the Moors, made it her petition that she might keep a Punch-house for her maintenance."—In Wheeler, i. 184.

1697. "Monday, 1st April . . . Mr. Cheesely having in a Punch-house, upon a quarrel of words, drawn his Sword . . . and being taxed therewith, he both doth own and justify the drawing of the sword . . .

* This seems to have puzzled the English translator (John Davies, 2nd ed., 1669), who has "excellent good sack, English beer, French wines, Arak, and other refreshments, p. 10.

it thereupon ordered not to wear a sword while here."—In Wheeler, i. 320.

1727. "... Of late no small Pains and Charge have been bestowed on its Buildings (of the Fort at Tellichery); but for what Reason I know not ... unless it be for small Vessels ... or to protect the Company's Ware-house, and a small Punch-house that stands on the Sea-shore ..."—A. Ham. i. 299.

1789. "Many ... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1810. "The best house of that description which admits boarders, and which are commonly called Punch-houses."—Williamson, V.M., i. 135.

Punchayet, s. Hind. panchāyat, from pañch, 'five.' A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or what-not, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1810. "The Parsees ... are governed by their own panchait, or village Council. The word panchait literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guebres in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the sect."—Maria Graham, 41.

1813. "The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durbār, where the arbitrators assembled: there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a panchaset or jury of five persons."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 359.

1819. "The punchayet itself, although in all but village causes it has the defects before ascribed to it, possessed many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and ... the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on no principles that were not generally understood."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 89.

1821. "I kept up punchayets because I found them ... I still think that the punchayet should on no account be dropped, that it is an excellent institution for dispensing justice, and in keeping up the principles of justice, which are less likely to be observed among a people to whom the administration of it is not at all intrusted."—Ibid. 124.

1826. "... When he returns assemble a punchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hybatty has justice."—Pandurang Hari, 31.

1873. "The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons ... the punchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India."—Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

Pundit, s. Skt. paṇḍita, 'a learned man.' Properly a man learned in Sanskrit lore. The Pundit of the Supreme Court was a Hindu Law-Officer, whose duty it was to advise the English Judges when needful on questions of Hindu Law. The office became extinct on the constitution of the 'High Court,' superseding the Supreme Court and Sudder Court, under the Queen's Letters Patent of May 14th, 1862.

In the Mahratta and Telugu countries, the word Paṇḍit is usually pronounced Pant (in English colloquial Punt); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Mahratta history e.g., the Nānā Dhundopant of evil fame.

Within the last 16 or 17 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Himalayan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly applied there much as Domine used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nain Singh, C.S.I.

1574. "I hereby give notice that ... I hold it good, and it is my pleasure, and therefore I enjoin on all the paṇḍits (paṇḍitos) and Gentoo physicians (phísicos gentios) that they ride not through this City (of Goa) or the suburbs thereof on horseback, nor in chairs and palanquins, on pain of paying, on the first offence 10 crúzados, and on the second 20 peru o sapal,* with the forfeiture of such horses, chairs, or palanquins, and on the third they shall become the galley-slaves of the King my Lord ...

* Peru o sapal, i.e. 'for the marsh.' We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1543 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodity of its shipping and the landing of goods, &c., makes a grant "of the marsh inundated with sea-water (do sarnal a'p'p'nd' dagoa satgada) which extends along the rivers de from the houses of Antonio Correa to the houses of Afonso Piquo, which grant is to be perpetual. ... to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankahalls (banagases), and never to be turned away to any other purpose." Possibly the fines went into a fund for the drainage of this sapal and formation of landing-places. See Archiv. Port. Or., Fasc. 2, pp. 180-181.

1663. "A Pendet Brachman or Heathen Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah ... would needs make his Panegyrick ... and at last concluded seriously with this; When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Feet, the eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it." —Bernier, E. T., 85.

1688. "Je feignis donc d'être malade, et d'avoir la fièvre, on fit venir aussitôt un Pandite ou médecin Gentil." —Dellon, Rel. de l'Inq. de Goa, 214.

1785. "I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our pundits, who deal out Hindu law as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made." —Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Ld. Teignmouth, 1807, ii. 67.

The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth Macaulay's flaming wrath, in the quotation lower down, was not a new one.

1798. "... the most learned of the Pandits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal." —Raynal, Hist. i. 42.

1856. "Besides ... being a Fundit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds." —Life and Letters of Sydney Dobell, ii. 14.

1860. "Mr. Vizetelly next makes me say that the principle of limitation is found 'amongst the Pandects of the Benares ...' The Benares he probably supposes to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandects to be I shall not presume to guess ... If Mr. Vizetelly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pandits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pandit is." —Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877. "Colonel Y—. Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person, this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him. . .

I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pundit." —Address by Sir R. Alcock, Prest. R. Geog. Soc., May 28th.

"Colonel Y— in reply, said: . . . Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work. . . He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employés with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford me great pleasure to take steps for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pundit." —Reply to the President, same date.

Punjaub, n. p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo-Indian province so-called, now extends on one side beyond the Indus, including Peshāwar, the Derajāt, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Dehli. The name is Pers. Panj-āb, 'Five Rivers.' These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelam (q.v.) or Behat, the ancient Vitasta which the Greeks made Υδάσπης (Strabo) and Βυδάσπης (Ptol.), (3) Chenāb, ancient Chandrabāgha and Asiknī. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Σαυδαβάλ, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e., probably because Grecized it would be Σαυδοπάδος, 'the devourer of Alexander.' The alternative Asiknī they rendered Ἀκείνυς. (4) Ravi, the ancient Airavati, Υάσπης (Strabo), Υδάσπης (Arrian), Ἀδης or Ποῦαδης (Ptol.). (5) Biās, ancient Vipāsā, Υπαρῖς (Arrian), Βυάριος (Ptol.). This excludes the Sutlej, Σατάδρου, Ἡσυχδρὺς of Pliny, Ζαπάδρος or Ζαδάσπης (Ptol.), as Timur excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we can hardly exclude the Chenāb as Wassāf does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers, though they knew all the rivers.* Lassen however has termed the country Pentapotamia in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Panjāb is Persian, and dates from Mahomedan times, the corresponding Sanskrit Panchanada is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahābhārat and Ramāyana. The name Panj-āb, in older Mahomedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjab. In that sense Panj-nad, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used.

We remember in the newspapers, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of "the bloody Punjab of Lahore."

B.C. 2. "Having explored the land of the Pahlavi and the country adjoining, there had then to be searched Panchanada in every part; the monkeys then explore the region of Kashmir with its woods of acacias."—Ramāyana, Bk. iv. ch. 43.

c. 940. Mas'ūdī details (with no correctness) the five rivers that form the Mihrān or Indus. He proceeds: "When the Five Rivers which we have named have past the House of Gold which is Mūltān, they unite at a place three days distant from that city, between it and Manṣūra at a place called Doshāb."—i. 377-8.

c. 1020. "They all (Sind, Jhailam, Irāwa, Biah) combine with the Satlader (Sutlej) below Mūltān, at a place called Panjnād, or 'the junction of the five rivers.' They form a very wide stream."—Al-Birūnī, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1300. "After crossing the Panj-āb, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelam, the river of Lohāwar,* Satlit, and Biyah . . ."—Wassāf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1333. "By the grace of God our caravan arrived safe and sound at Banj-āb, i.e. at the River of the Sind. Banj (panj) signifies 'five,' and āb, 'water'; so that the name means 'the Five Waters.' They flow into this great river, and water the country."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 91.

c. 1400. "All these (united) rivers (Jelam, Chenāb, Rāvi, Biyāh, Sind) are called the Sind or Panj-āb, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta."—The Emp. Timur, in Elliot, iii. 476.

1648. "... Pang-ab, the chief city of which is Lahor, is an excellent and fruitful province, for it is watered by the five rivers of which we have formerly spoken."—Van Twist, 3.

"The River of the ancient Indus, is by the Persians and Magols called Pang-ab, i.e. the Five Waters."—Id. i.

1710. "He found this ancient and famous city (Lahore) in the Province Panschaap, by the side of the broad and fish-abounding river Rari (for Ravi)."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 282.

1790. "Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjab, would in many cases widely differ."—Forster, Preface to Journey.

1793. "The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is oftener named Panjab than Lahore."—Rennell's Memoir, 3d ed. 82.

1804. "I rather think . . . that he (Holkar) will go off to the Punjab. And what gives me stronger reason to think so is, that on the seal of his letter to me he calls himself 'the Slave of Shah Mahmoud, the King of Kings.' Shah Mahmoud is the brother of Zemaun Shah. He seized the musnud and government of Caulb, after having defeated Zemaun Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes."—Wellington, Desp. under 17th March.

1815. "He (Subagtagteen) . . . overran the fine province of the Punjab, in his first expedition."—Malcolm, Hist. of Pers., i. 316.

Punkah, s. In its original sense (a) a portable fan (Hind. pankhā), generally made from the leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis, or 'fan shaped'), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such pankhās in India are not however formed, as Chinese fans are, like those of our ladies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is (b) to the large, fixed, and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormus) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhri, which show that the true Anglo-Indian punka was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

without calling daring to goe vp to him, saue onely two Punkaws to gather wind."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 439.

The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who plied the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to punkaw:

"... behind one punkawing, another holding his sword."—ib. 433.

Terry does not use the word:

1616. "... the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing about them, who continually beat the air upon them with Flabella's, or Fans, of stiffed leather, which keepe off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lye."—Ed. 1665, p. 405.

1663. "On such occasions they desire nothing but . . . to lie down in some cool and shady place all along, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Pankas, or Fans."—Bernier, E. T., p. 76.

1787. "Over her head was held a punker."—Sir C. Malet, in Parl. Papers, 1821, 'Hindoo Widows.'

1809. "He . . . presented me . . . two punkahs."—Lord Valentia, i. 428.

1881. "The chair of state, the sella gestatoria, in which the Pope is borne aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, of the Roman Princes . . . the fans which go behind are the punkahs of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 207.

c. 1150-60. "Sous le nom de Khaïsch on entend des étoffes de mauvaïse toile de lin qui servent à différents usages. Dans ce passage de Rhazès * ce sont des ventilateurs faits de cet étoffe. Ceci se pratique de cette manière: on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d'un tapis, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le rembourre avec des objets qui ont de la consistance et qui ne plient pas facilement, par exemple avec du sparte. L'ayant ensuite suspendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lacher doucement et continuellement par un homme placé dans le haut de l'appartement. De cette manière il fait beaucoup de vent et rafraichit l'air. Quelquefois on le trempe dans de l'eau de rose, et alors il parfume l'air en même temps qu'il le rafraichit."—Glossaire sur le Mançouri, quoted in Dozy et Engelmann, p. 342. See also Dozy, Suppl. aux Dict. Arabes, s. v. Khaïsch.

1166. "He (Ibn Hamdun the Kātib) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of the linen fan: (1)
'Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free. Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path lie closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey.'"—Quoted by Ibn Khallikan, E. T., iii. 91.

(1) The linen fan (Mirwaha-t al Khaish) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irāk. See de Sacy's Hariri, p. 474.—Note by MacGuckin de Slane, ib. p. 92.

c. 1300. "One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansūr (A.D. 753-774) was the Kharsh of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Sāsānian Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."—Et-Fakhri, ed. Ahlwardt, p. 188.

1596. "And (they use) instruments like swings with fans, to rock the people in, and to make wind for cooling, which they call cattaventos."—Literal Translin. from Linschoten, ch. 6.

1598. "And they vse certaine instruments like Wagging, with bellowes, to beare all the people in, and to gather winde to coole them withall, which they call Cattaventos."—Old English Translation by W. P., p. 16.

The French version is really a brief description of the punka:

1610. "Ilz ont aussi du Cattaventos qui sont certains instruments pendus en l'air es quels se faisant donner le bransle ils font du vent qui les rafraichit."—Ed. 1638, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punka:

1663. "... furnished also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffing."—Bernier, p. 79.

1807. "As one small concern succeeds another, the punkah vibrates gently over my eyes."—Lord Minto in India, 27.

1810. "Were it not for the punka (a large frame of wood covered with cloth) which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would scarcely be possible to sit out the melancholy ceremony of an Indian dinner."—Maria Graham, 30.

Williamson mentions that punkahs "were suspended in most dining halls."—Vade Mecum, i. 281.

1852.

(Our Christmas waits!) prelude the day;
For holly and festoons of bay
Swing feeble punkas,—or perhaps A windsail dangles in collapse."

Christmas on board a P. and O., near the Equator.

1875. "The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead."—The Dilemma (Chesney), ch. xxxviii.

Punsaree, s. A native drug-seller; Hind. pansāri. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says 'it is certainly a foreign word,' and assigns it to a corruption of dispensarium; which is much to be doubted.

Purdah, s. Hind. from Pers. parda, 'a curtain'; a portière; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion, is termed parda-nishīn, 'one who sits behind a curtain.'

1809. "On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across."—Ld. Valentia, i. 100.

1810. "If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture . . . in order to feel the patient's pulse."—Williamson,
V. M., i. 130.

1878. "Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 113.

Purwanna, Perwanna, s. Hind. from Pers. parwāna, an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a licence or pass.

1682. "... we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Perwanna from the Duan of Decca to excuse us from it."—Hedges, Oct. 10.

1693. "... Egmore and Pursewaukum were lately granted us by the Nabob's purwannas."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1759. "Perwanna, under the Coochuck
(or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulma Maleck, Nizam ul Muluck Bahadour, to Mr. John Spenser."—In Cambridge's Act. of the War, 230. See also quotation under Hosbolhookum.

1774. "As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your parwanna to this purpose before the departure of the caravan."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet,

But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

Putchock, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalaya in the vicinity of Kashmir, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient in the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jostick. This root was recognized by the famous Garcia de Orta as the Costus of the ancients. The latter took their word from the Skt. kustha, by a modification of which name—kut
—it is still known and used as a medicine in Upper India. De Orta speaks of the plant as growing about Mandu and Chitore, whence it was brought for sale to Ahmadabad; but his informants misled him. The true source was traced in situ by two other illutrious men, Royle and Falconer, to a plant belonging to the N. O. Compositæ, Saussurea Xappe, Clarke, for which Dr. Falconer, not recognizing the genus, had proposed the name of Aucklandia.
Costus verus, in honour of the then Governor-General. The Costus is a gregarious plant, occupying open, sloping, moist sides of the mountains, at an elevation of 8000 to 9000 feet.
See article by Falconer in *Trans. Linn.
Soc.* xix. 23-31.

The trade-name is, according to Wilson, the Telugu pāchi'chāku, 'green leaf,' but one does not see how this applies. (Is there, perhaps, some confusion with Patch, q.v.?). De Orta speaks as if the word, which he writes pucho, were Malay. Though neither Crawford nor Favre gives the word, in this sense, it is in Marsden's earlier Malay dictionary: "Pūchok, a plant, the aromatic leaves of which are an article of trade; said by some to be Costus indicus, and by others the Melissa, or Laurus." In the year 1837-38 about 250 tons of this article, valued at £10,000, were exported from Calcutta alone. The annual import into China at a later date, according to Wells
Williams, was 2,000 peculs or 120 tons
(Middle Kingdom, ed. 1857, ii. 408).
In 1865-66, the last year for which the details of such minor exports are found in print, the quantity exported from Calcutta was only 492½ cwt., or 24½ tons.

1520. "We have prohibited (the export of) pepper to China...and now we prohibit the export of pucho and incense from these parts of India to China."—Capitula de hum Regimento del Rey a Diogo Ayres, Feitor da China, in Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. v., 49.

1534. "The bêur of pucho contains 20 faraçolas, and an additional 4 of pioota (q.v.), in all 24 faraçolas. . . ."—A. Nunes, 11.

1563. "I say that costus in Arabic is called cost or cast; in Guzarate it is called uplot; and in Malay, for in that region there is a great trade and consumption thereof, it is called pucho. I tell you the name in Arabic, because it is called by the same name by the Latins and Greeks, and I tell it you in Guzerati, because that is the land to which it is chiefly carried from its birth-place; and I tell you the Malay name because the greatest quantity is consumed there, or taken thence to China."—Garcia, f. 72.

1727. "The Wood Ligna dulcis grows only in this country (Sind). It is rather a Weed than a Wood, and nothing of it is useful but the Root, called Putchock, or Radix dulcis. . . There are great quantities exported from Surat, and from thence to China, where it generally bears a good Price. . . ."—A. Ham., i. 126.

1808. "Elles emploient ordinairement . . . une racine aromatique appelée pieschtok, qu'on coupe par petits morceaux, et fait bouillir dans de l'huile de noix de coco. C'est avec cette huile que les danseuses se graissent . . ."—Haafner, ii. 117.

1862. "Koot is sent down country in large quantities, and is exported to China, where it is used as incense. It is in Calcutta known under the name of 'Patchuk.'"—Punjab Trade Report, cvii.

Puttywalla, s. Hind. paṭṭa-wālā, 'one with a belt.' This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an office, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chuprassy or peon (qq.v.), and in Madras usually by the latter name.

1878. "Here and there a belted Government servant, called a Puttiwālā, or Paṭṭawālā, because distinguished by a belt. . . ."—Monier Williams, Modern India, 34.

Putlam, n.p. A town in Ceylon on the coast of the bay or estuary of Calpenty; properly Putṭalama; a Tamil name, said by Mr. Ferguson to be puthu- (puṭu?) alam, 'New Salt-pans.' Ten miles inland are the ruins of Tammana Newera, the original Tambapanni (or Taprobane), where Vijaya, the first Hindu immigrant, established his kingdom. And Putlam is supposed to be the site where he landed.

1726. "Portaloon or Futelan."—Valentyjn, Ceylon, 21.

Puttân, Pathan, n. p. Hind. Paṭhān. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtān and Pukhtān, pl. Pukhtāna, the name the Afghans give their own race, with which Dr. Trumpp agrees. The Afghans have for the name one of the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below.*

The Mahommedans in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz., Paṭhāns; Mughals, i.e., those of Turki origin; Shaikhs, claiming Arab descent; and Saiyyids, claiming also to be descendants of Mahommed.

1553. "This State belonged to a people called Patane, who were lords of that hill-country. And as those who dwell on the skirts of the Pyrenees, on this side and on that, are masters of the passes by which we cross from Spain to France, or vice versa, so these Patan people are the masters of the two entrances to India, by which those who go thither from the landward must pass . . ."—Barros, IV. vi. 1.

Putwa, s. Hind. patwa. The Hibiscus sabbdariffa, L., from the succulent acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households.

Pye, s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Paria-dog (q.v.); a contraction, no doubt, of the former word.

Pyjammās, s. Hind. pāe-jāma, lit. 'leg-clothing.' A pair of loose drawers or trowsers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g. by women of various classes, by Sikh men, and by most Mahomedans of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahomedans by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with long-drawers (q.v., also Shulwaur and Mogul-breeches). It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrard (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital: "Ils ont force calsons sans quoy ne couchent iamais les Portugais des Indes" (ii, p. 11). The word is now used in London shops.

Pyke, Paik, s. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: "Páik, or Páyik, corruptly Pyke, H. &c. (from S. padātika), Páik or Páyak, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, or inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a courier, a village watchman: in Outtack the Páiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Zamindárs or Rájas by the tenure of military service," &c., quoting Bengal Regulations).

But it seems to us clear that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paik, a foot-runner or courier. We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hammer Purgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Áin, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paik (with the fatḥa vowel point).

c. 1590. "The Jilauddar" (see under Julibdar) "and the Paik (a runner). Their monthly pay varies from 1200 to 120*d*. (dams), according to their speed and manner of service. Some of them will run from 50 to 100 kroh (kos) per day.—Ā'in, E. T. by Blochmann, i. 138 (see orig., i. 144).

1673. At the Court of Constantinople: "Les Peiks venoient ensuite, avec leurs bonnets d'argent doré ornés d'un petit plumage de héron, un arc et un carquois chargé de flèches."—Journal d'A. Galland, i. 98.

1687. "... the under officers and servants called Agiam-Oglans, who are designed to the meaner uses of the Seraglio ... most commonly the sons of Christians taken from their Parents at the age of 10 or 12 years. . . These are: 1, Porters, 2, Bostangies or Gardiniers . . . 5, Paicks and Solacks. . ."—Sir Paul Rycaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, 19.

1761. "Ahmad Sultan then commissioned Shah Pasand Khan . . . the harkdars and the Paiks, to go and procure information as to the state and strength of the Mahratta army."—Muhammad Jāfar Shāmlu, in Elliot, viii. 151-2.

1840. "The express-riders (Eilbothen) accomplished 50 farsangs a-day, so that an express came in 4 days from Khorasan to Tebri (Tabriz). . . The Foot-runners carrying letters (Peik), whose name at least is maintained to this day at both the Persian and Osmanli Courts, accomplished 30 farsangs a-day."—Hammer Purgstall, Gesch. der Golden. Horde, 243.

b. Hind. pāik and pāyik (also Mahr. from Skt. padātika, and padika, 'a foot-soldier,' with the other specific applications given by Wilson, exclusive of 'courier.' In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.

In the first quotation, which is from the Āin, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source:

c. 1590. "It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Bengal) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (pāyik), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a confederacy with these guards, who one night killed the King, Futteh Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuck Shah."—Gladwin's Tr., ed. 1800, ii. 19 (original, i. 415).

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for 'a seaman.' Compare uses of Lascar.

c. 1615. "(His fleet) consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call paiques, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topazes who were excellent musketeers; 50 hired jalias* of like sort and his own (Sebastian Gonçalves) galliot,* which was about the size of a patacho, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the fore-castle, and 60 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topazes and Cafres."—Bocarro, Decada, 452.

1722. Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindāry of Rājshāhi appears:

"9. Paikan, or the pikes, guard of villages, everywhere necessary . . . 2,161 rupees."—Fifth Report, App., p. 345.

1802. After a detail of persons of rank in Midnapore:

"None of these entertain armed followers except perhaps ten or a dozen Peons for state, but some of them have Pykes in considerable numbers, to keep the peace on their estates. These Pykes are under the magistrate's orders."—Fifth Report, App., p. 535.

1812. "The whole of this last-mentioned numerous class of Pykes, are understood to have been disbanded, in compliance with the new Police regulations."—Fifth Report, 71.

1872. "... Dalais or officers of the peasant militia (Paiks). The Paiks were settled chiefly around the fort on easy tenures."—Hunter's Orissa, ii. 269.

Q.

Quedda, n. p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to Crawford is Malay kadāh, 'an elephant-trap.' It is therefore in all probability identical with the Hind. name for that apparatus (see Keddah). It has been supposed sometimes that Kadāh is the Kāl or Kāl of Ptolemy's sea-route to China, and likewise the Kalah of the early Arab voyagers (see Procgs. R. Geog. Soc. 1882, p. 655.) It is possible that these old names however represent Kwala, 'a river mouth,' a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Quedda is called by the Malays Kwala Batrang.

1516. "Having left this town of Tanasary, further along the coast towards Malaca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Ansam, which is called Queda, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise."—Barbosa, 188-189.

1553. "... The settlements from Tavay to Malaca are these: Tenassary, a notable city, Lungur, Torráo, Quedá, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pedão, Pérá, Solungor, and our City of Malaca . . ."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1614. "And so . . . Diogo de Mendonça . . . sending the galliots on before, embarked in the jalia of João Rodriguez de Paiva, and coming to Queda, and making an attack at daybreak, and finding them unprepared, he burnt the town, and carried off a quantity of provisions and some tin" (calaim, see Calay).—Bocarro, Decada, 187.

Quilooa, n. p. i.e., Kilwa, in lat. 9° 0' S., next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the ne plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Cape Boyador was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilwa does not occur in the Geographies of Edrisi or Abulfeda, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Roteiro, and in Barros's account of Da Gama's voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quilooa, and says that it was founded in about A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadoxo and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

c. 1220. "Kilwa, a place in the country of the Zenj, a city."—Yāqūt (orig.), iv. 302.

c. 1330. "I embarked at the town of Makdashau (Magadoxo), making for the country of the Sawahil, and the town of Kulwa, in the country of the Zenj . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191.

1498. "Here we learned that the island of which they told us in Mocombiqu as being peopled by Christians is an island at which dwells the King of Mocombiqu himself, and that the half is of Moors, and the half of Christians, and in this island is much seed-pearl, and the name of the island is Quyluee . . ."—Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 48.

1501. "Quilloa è cittade in Arabia in vna insuletta giunta a terra firma, ben popolata de homini negri et mercadanti: edificata al modo nro: Quiui hanno abundantia de auro: argento: ambra: muschio: et perle: ragionevolmente vesteno panni de sera: et banbaxi fini."—Letter of X. Emanuel, 2.

1506. "Del 1502 . . . mandò al viaggio naue 21, Capitanio Don Vasco de Gamba, che fu quello che discoperse l'India . . . e nell' andar de li, del Cao de Bona Speranza, zonse in uno loco chiamato Ochilia; la qual terra è dentro uno rio . . ."—Leonardo da Masser, 17.

1553. "The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quilooa, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To wreak this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gama, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quilooa, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thither."—Barros, I. iv. 5.

Quilon, n. p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore; once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kaulam. The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as 'Palace' or 'royal residence,' from Kolu, 'the royal Presence,' or Hall of Audience. For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Malé of Cosmas in the 6th century (v. Malabar), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reinaud. The 'Kollam era' in general use in Malabar, dates from A.D. 824; but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syriac extract (which is, however, modern) in Land's Anecdota Syriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac, p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in A.D. 823, and got leave from King Shakirbirtî to build a church and city at Kaulam. It would seem that there is some connexion between the date assigned to this event, and the 'Kollam era;' but what it is we cannot say. Shakirbirtî is evidently a form of Chakravartî Rāja (see under Chucker-butty). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop. (in 1875) 14,366; there is little trade. It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the middle ages the name occurs in the form Columbum, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniya in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordanus of Severac, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or obtained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de' Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Columbum is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Anti-quary, ii. 360) which shows that the city was called in Sanskrit Kolamba. The form Palumbum also occurs in most of the MSS. of Friar Odoric's Journey; this is more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of columba and palumbes.*

c. 1731. "Nizam-ul Mulk . . . thus got rid of . . . the rāhdārī from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen upon travellers and traders."—Khāfi Khan. in Elliot, vii. 531.

Raggy, s. Rāḡī (the word seems to be Dec. Hindustani); a kind of grain, Eleusine Coracana, Gaertn. (Cynosurus Coracanus, Linn.), largely cultivated, as a staple of food, in Southern India.

1792. "The season for sowing raggy, rice, and bajera from the end of June to the end of August."—Life of T. Munro, iii. 92.

1793. "The Mahratta supplies consisting chiefly of Raggy, a coarse grain, which grows in more abundance than any other in the Mysore Country, it became necessary to serve it out to the troops, giving rice only to the sick."—Dirom, 10.

Raja, Rajah, s. Skt. Rājā, 'a king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemindars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahomedan predecessors, on Hindūs, as Nawāb is upon Moslem. Rāi, Rāo, Rānā, Rāwāl, Rāya (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindū civilization to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Rājā cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Rachias be an exception. In early Mahomedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Rāo and Rāi, are those which we find. (Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right). Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

c. 1338. "... Baha-uddin fled to one of the heathen Kings called the Rāi Kanbihah. The word Rāi among those people, just as among the people of Rūm, signifies 'King.'"—Ibn Bat., iii. 318.

The traveller here refers, as appears by another passage, to the Spanish Rey.

1612. "In all this part of the East there are 4 castes. . . . The first caste is that of the Rayas, and this is a most noble race from which spring all the Kings of Canara. . . ."—Couto, V. vi. 4.

1683. "I went a hunting with ye Rages, who was attended with 2 or 300 men, armed with bows and arrows, swords and targets."—Hedges, March 1.

1786. Tippoob with gross impropriety addresses Louis XVI. as "the Rajah of the French."—Select Letters, p. 369.

Rajamundry, n.p. A town (formerly head-place of a district) on the lower Godavery R.

The name is in Telugu, Rājamahendravaram, 'King-chief ('s)-Town.'

Rajpoot, s. Hind. Rājput, from Skt. Rājaputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a honorific assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great mediæval bard of the Rājputs, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihār, Pramār, Solankhi, and Chauhān) who sprung into existence from the sacred Agnikund or Firepit on the summit of Mount Abū. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 99 clans.

The Rājputs thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmins do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is factitious. "The Rajpoots," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both unclean in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate castes" (Rāsmālā, reprint 1878, p. 537).

An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repast of the flesh of wild boar killed in the chase (see Terry's representation of this below), is a Rājput characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers.

In Lord Canning's time the young

Rājput Rājā of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, inasmuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open darbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profligate Mahommedans, who had so influenced his conduct that, among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, 'Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!' It seemed the ne plus ultra of Rājput degeneration! The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashboot, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi 'Alī shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them Reys Butos, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516. "There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Razbutes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentile, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country."—Barbosa, 50.

1533. "Inasmuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladin placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fight; and Saladin ordered them to be set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whereupon all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Resbutes fought in such a way that they drove the Guzarat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished."—Correa, iii. 527.

"And with the stipulation that the 200 pardaos, which are paid as allowance to the lascarins of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Baçaim and the Reys butos, shall be paid out of the revenues of Baçaim as they have been paid hitherto."—Treaty of Nuno da Cunha with the K. of Cambaya, in Subsidios, 137.

c. 1554. "But if the caravan is attacked, and the Bats (see Bhat) kill themselves, the Rashbūts, according to the law of the Bāts, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death."—Sidi 'Alī Kapudān, in J. As., Ser. I., tom. ix. 95.

c. 1614. "The next day they embarked, leaving in the city, what of those killed in fight and those killed by fire, more than 800 persons, the most of them being Regibutos, Moors of great valour; and of ours fell eighteen. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 210.

1616. ". . . it were fitter he were in the Company of his brother . . . and his safetie more regarded, then in the hands of a Rashboote Gentile. . . ."—Sir T. Roe, i. 553-4.

"The Rashbootes eate Swines-flesh most hateful to the Mahometans."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1638. "These Rasboutes are a sort of Highway men, or Tories."—Mandelslo, Eng. by Davies, 1669, p. 19.

1648. "These Resbouts (Resbouden) are held for the best soldiers of Gusurata."—Van Twist, 39.

1673. "Next in esteem were the Reshpoots or Souldiers."—Fryer, 27.

1689. "The place where they went ashore was at a Town of the Moors, which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the Great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolaters Gentous or Rashbouts."—Dampier, i. 507.

1791. ". . . Quatre cipayes ou reispoutes montés sur des chevaux persans, pour l'escorter."—B. de St. Pierre, Chauvière Indienne.

Rains, The, s. The common Anglo-Indian colloquial for the Indian rainy season. The same idiom, as chuvas, had been already in use by the Portuguese. See Winter.

c. 1666. "Lastly, I have imagined that if in Dehli, for example, the Rains come from the East, it may yet be that the Seas which are Southerly to it are the origin of them, but that they are forced by reason of some Mountains . . . to turn aside and discharge themselves another way. . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 138.

1707. "We are heartily sorry that the Rains have been so very unhealthy with you."—Letter in Orme's Fragments.

1750. "The Rains . . . setting in with great violence, overflowed the whole country."—Orme's Hist., i. 153 (ed. 1803).

1868. "The place is pretty, and although it is 'the Rains' there is scarcely any day when we cannot get out."—Bishop Milman, in Memoir, p. 67.

Rambotang, s. Malay, rambūtan (Filet, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin luscious pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambūt, 'hair.'

1613. "And other native fruits, such as

bachoes (perhaps bachang, the Mangifera foetida?) rambotans, rambes,* bucasducos,* and pomegranates, and innumerable others. . . .<sup>5</sup>—Godinho de Eredia, 16.

1726. "... the ramboetan-tree (the fruit of which the Portuguese call frocta dos caxiferos or Caffier's fruit)."—Valentijn (v.) Sumatra, 3.

1727. "The Rambostan is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tough Skin, beset with Capillaments; within the Skin is a very savoury Pulp."—A. Ham., ii. 81.

1783. "Mangustines, rambustines, &c."—Forrest, Mergui, 40.

Ramasammy, s. This corruption of Rāmaswāmi ('Lord Rāmā'), a common Hindū proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a). As a generic name for Hindūs, like 'Tommy Atkins' for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, etc.

(b). For a twisted roving of cotton in a tube (often of wrought silver) used to furnish light for a cigar (see Fuleeta). Madras use:

8.—1880. "... if you want a clerk to do your work or a servant to attend on you, . . . you would take on a saponaceous Bengali Baboo, or a servile abject Madras Ramasammy. . . A Madras, even if wrongly abused, would simply call you his father, and his mother, and his aunt, defender of the poor, and epitome of wisdom, and would take his change out of you in the bazaar accounts."—Cornhill Mag., Nov. 1880, pp. 552-3.

Ramdā, s. Hind. from Ar. ramāzān (ramadhan.) The ninth Mahommedan lunar month, viz., the month of the Fast.

1615. "... at this time, being the preparation to this Ramdā or Lent."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537.

1623. "The 29th June: I think that (to-day) the Moors have commenced their ramadhan, according to the rule by which I calculate."—P. Della Valle, ii. 607.

1686. "They are not . . . very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, except it be Ramdā time as we call it. . . . In this time they fast all Day. . . ."—Dampier, i. 343.

Ramoosy, n.p. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr.

Rāmosi, originally one of the thieving tribes. Hence they came to be employed as hereditary watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokeydars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapūr. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telugu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang.

1833. "There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendancy over the village Patells and Koolkurnies (Coolcurnee) but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly . . . and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 19.

1883. "Till a late hour in the morning he (the chameleon) sleeps, sounder than a ramoosy or a chowkeydar; nothing will wake him."—Tribes on My Frontier.

Ram-Ram! The commonest salutation between two Hindūs meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.

1673. "Those whose Zeal transports them no further than to die at home, are immediately Washed by the next of Kin, and bound up in a Sheet; and as many as go with him carry them by turns on a Colt-staff; and the rest run almost naked and shaved, crying after him Ram, Ram."—Fryer, 101.

1726. "The wives of Bramines (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps, a pinang (q.v.), which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends who stand by, and after taking leave of them, go and lie over the corpse, calling out only Ram, Ram."—Valentijn, v. 51.

Sir G. Birdwood writes: "In 1869-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very doleful, dull, and miserable to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxed it in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I bethought me of its being a Mahratta poput, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Mahratti to it; when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against the bars, and laid its head against my knuckles. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager flurry to salute me as I drew near to it."

Ranee, s. A Hindū queen; rānī, fem. of rājā, from Skt. rājñī (= regina).

1673. "Bedmure (Bednūr) . . . is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranna, the Relict of Sham Shunker Naig."—Fryer, 162.

1809. "The young Rannie may marry whomsoever she pleases."—Lord Valentia, i. 364.

1879. "There were once a Raja and a Rané who had an only daughter."—Stokes, Indran Fairy Tales, 1.

Rangoon, n.p. Burm. Ran-gun, said to mean 'War-end'; the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alompra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional assonance to Da-gun, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies."

Occupied by the British forces in May, 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176 (1881).

Ranjow, s. A Malay term, ranjau. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground, to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Marsden's H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 276.

Raseed, s. Hind. rasīd. A native corruption of the English 'receipt,' shaped, probably, by the Pers. rasīda, 'arrived'; viz., an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand.'

1877. "There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasīd' (receipt), and 'Apīl' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 282.

Rat-bird, s. The striated bush-babbler (Chattarhoea caudata, Dumeril); see Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 3.

Rattan, s. The long stem of various species of Asiatic climbing palms, belonging to the genus Calamus and its allies, of which canes are made (not 'bamboo-canes,' improperly so-called), and which, when split, are used to form the seats of cane-bottomed chairs and the like. From Malay rotan, applied to various species of Calamus and Daemonorops (see Filet, No. 696 et seq.). Some of these attain a length of several hundred feet, and are used in the Himalaya and the Kasia Hills for making suspension-bridges, &c., rivalling rope in strength.

1511. "The Governor set out from Malacca in the beginning of December, of this year, and sailed along the coast of Pedir. . . . He met with such a contrary gale that he was obliged to anchor, which he did with a great anchor, and a cable of rōtas, which are slender but tough canes, which they twist and make into strong cables."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 269.

1563. "They took thick ropes of rotas (which are made of certain twigs which are very flexible) and cast them round the feet, and others round the tusks."—Garcia, i. 90.

1598. "There is another sorte of the same reedes which they call Rota: these are thinne like twiggies of Willow for baskets. . . ."—Linschoten, 28.

c. 1610. "Il y a vne autre sorte de canne qui ne vient iamais plus grosse que le petit doigt . . . et il ploye comme osier. Ils l'appellent Rotan. Ils en font des cables de nauire, et quantité de sortes de paniers gentiment entre lasses."—Fyrrar de Laval, i. 237.

1673. ". . . the Materials Wood and Plaister, beautified without with folding Windows, made of Wood and latticed with Rattans . . ."—Fryer, 27.

1844. "In the deep vallies of the south the vegetation is most abundant and various. Among the most conspicuous species are . . . the rattan winding from trunk to trunk and shooting his pointed head above all his neighbours."—Notes on the Kasia Hills and People, in J. A. S. B., vol. xiii. pt. ii. 615.

Ravine-deer. The sportsman's name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella Bennettii, Jerdon).

Razzia, s. This is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Arab. ghāziya, 'an attack upon infidels.'

Reaper, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so-called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind. dictionary; but in the Mahratti dict. we find rīp in this sense.

Reas, Rees, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay, the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Portuguese real, pl. réis. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and reas, down at least to November, 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673. (In Goa) "The Vinteen . . . 15 Basrooks (see Budgrook), whereof 75 make a Tango, and 60 Rees make a Tango."—Fryer, 207.

1727. "Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Rayes and Rupees. 1 Rupee is . . . 400 Rayes."—A. Ham., ii. App. 6.

Red Cliffs, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mount Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the Ῥυῖπτόν ὄρος of the Periplus.

c. 80–90. "Another village, Bakarē, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nellynda . . . From Bakare extends the Red-Hill (Ῥυῖπτόν ὄρος), and then a long stretch of country called Paralia."—Periplus, §§ 55–58.

1727. "I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the Northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking."—A. Ham. i. 332.

1813. "Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped."—Milburn, Or. Comm., i. 335. See also Dunn's New Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 161.

1814. "From thence (Quilone) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Boccoli (qu. Bakarē as above?); where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 334.

1841. "There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships' boats to land."—Horsburgh's Direc., ed. 1841, i. 515.

c. 1752. "The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest."—Osbeck's Voyage, i. 190.

Regulation, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G. G. and Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company's settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of "Regulations of the Govt. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853" begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XLI. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1793, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1880. "The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, or to modify the 'laws and customs' by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed."—Saty. Review, March 13th, p. 335.

Regur, s. Dakh. Hind. regar, also legar. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India 'black cotton soil.' The word may possibly be connected with Hind. and Pers. reg, 'sand;' but regada or regadi is given by Wilson as Telugu. This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Rāj-mahl Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madura, Salem, Tanjore, Ramnād, and Tinnevely. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Saurgor, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and composes the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat. It is found also in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: "Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but . . . the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and . . . some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation."—Op. cit., i. 434.

Reh, s. A saline efflorescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst reh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet.

The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the treeless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the subsoil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, as are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren.

The canal-irrigation of the upper provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the subsoil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out.

Reinol, s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to 'Johnny Newcomes' or Griffins (q.v.). It is from reino, 'the Kingdom' (viz., of Portugal).

The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598. "... they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newlie come from Portingall, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portingales use there in India."—Linschoten, ch. xxxi.

c. 1610. "... quand ces soldats Portugais arriuent de nouueau aux Indes portans encor leurs habits du pays, ceux qui sont là de long tès quand ils les voyent par les ruës les appellent Renol, chargez de poux, et mille autres iniures et mocqueries."—Mocquet, 304.

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E. I. Co. Thus:

c. 1760. "With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynols."—Grose, i. 38.

Resident, s. This term has been used in two ways which require distinction. Thus (a), up to the organisation of the Civil Service in Warren Hastings's time, the chiefs of the Company's commercial establishments in the provinces, and for a short time the European chiefs of districts, were termed Residents.

But later the word was applied (b) also to the representative of the Governor-General at an important native Court, e.g., at Lucknow, Delhi, Hyderabad, and Baroda. And this is the only meaning that the term has now in British India.

In Dutch India the term is applied to the chief European officer of a province (corresponding to an Indian Zilla) as well as to the Dutch representative at a native court, as at Solo and Djokjocarta.

c. 1778. "My pay as Resident (at Sylhet) did not exceed 500*l.* per annum, so that fortune could only be acquired by my own industry."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the L's, iii. 174.

b.—

1798. "Having received overtures of a very friendly nature from the Rajah of Berar, who has requested the presence of a British Resident at his Court, I have despatched an ambassador to Nagpore with full powers to ascertain the precise nature of the Rajah's views."—Marquis Wellesley, Despatches, i. 99.

Respondentia, s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: "Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract" (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed., 1876).

What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hoogly, was known down to the first quarter of this century, as 'Respondentia Walk.' We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent juwaubs (q.v.); but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of 'Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

1720. "I am concerned with Mr. Thomas Theobalds in a respondentia Bond in the 'George' Brigantine."—Testament of Ch. Davers, Merchant. In Wheeler, ii. 340.

1727. "There was one Captain Perrin Master of a Ship, who took up about 500 L. on respondentia from Mr. Ralph Sheldon . . . payable at his Return to Bengal."—A. Ham., ii. 14.

"... which they are enabled to do by the Money taken up here on Respondentia bonds . . ."—In Wheeler, ii. 427.

1776. "I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on Ships in India . . . I have also subscribed £500 towards a China Voyage."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, Feb. 20.

1794. "I assure you, Sir, Europe articles, especially good wine, are not to be had for love, money, or respondentia."—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, &c., p. 206.

Ressaidar, s. P.-Hind. Rasāūdār. A native subaltern officer of irregular cavalry, under the Ressaldar (q.v.). It is not clear what sense rasāi has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is "quickness of apprehension; fitness, perfection."

Ressala, s. Hind. from Ar. risāla. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India originally applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a rasūl, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dozy). The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758. "Presently after Shokum Sing and Harroon Cawn (formerly of Roy Dulub's Rissalla) came in and discovered to him the whole affair."—Letter of W. Hastings in Gleig, i. 70.

Ressaldar, Ar. Per. Hind. Risāla-dār. Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse; though the first quotation shows it, in the south, applied to officers of infantry. Now applied to the native officer who commands a risāla in one of our regiments of "Irregular Horse."

1778. "The Nawab now gave orders to the Risaladars of the regular and irregular infantry, to encircle the fort, and then commence the attack with their artillery and musketry."—H. of Hydrur Nask, 327.

1803. "The rissaldars finding so much money in their hands, began to quarrel about the division of it, while Perron crossed in the evening with the body-guard."—Mil. Memoirs of James Skinner, i. 274.

c. 1831. "Le lieutenant de ma troupe a bonne chance d'être fait Capitaine (resseldar)."—Jacquemont, Corresp., ii. 8.

Rest-house, s. Much the same as Dak Bungalow (q.v.). Used in Ceylon only.

Resum, s. Lascar's Hind. for ration (Roebuck).

Rice, s. The well-known cereal, Oryza sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek ὀρύζα, which is the source of our word through It. riso, Fr. riz, etc., from the Tamil arisi, 'rice deprived of husk,' ascribed to a root ari, 'to separate.' It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (Flora Indica, ii. 200) says that a wild rice, known as Newaree by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant.

It is possible that the Arabic al-ruzz (arruzz) from which the Spaniards directly take their word arroz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that ópuça can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of ópuça by Theophrastus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristobulus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below) was a companion of Alexander's expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophrastus. The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer ópuça than vṛiṣi, the very common exchange of aspirate and sibilant might easily give a form like vṛisi or bṛisi (comp. hindū, sindū, &c.) in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing. 'a grain of rice' w'riṣu'h, pl. 'rice' w'riṣey, the former close to oryza. The same writer gives in Barakai (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a 'Tajik' tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanigoram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as w'rizza, a very close approximation again to oryza. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former, as rizza. The modern Persian word for husked rice is birinj, and Armenian brinz. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical bṛisi or vṛisi, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindū Kush tribes, e.g. Burishki (Khajuna of Leitner), bron; Shina (of Gilgit), brūn; Khowar of the Chitral Valley (Arniyah of Leitner), grinj.*

Rock-pigeon. The bird so-called by sportsmen in India is the Pterocles exustus of Temminck, belonging to the family of sand-grouse (Pteroclidæ). It occurs throughout India, except in the more wooded parts. In their swift high flight these birds look something like pigeons on the wing, whence perhaps the misnomer.

Roc, s. The Rukh or fabulous colossal bird of Arabian legend. This has been treated at length by one of the present writers in Marco Polo (Book III. ch. 33, notes); and here we shall only mention one or two supplementary facts.

M. Marre states that rāk-rāk is applied by the Malays to a bird of prey * Müller and (very positively) Fabricius discard Βουτύρον for Βοσπόρον, which "no fellow understands." A. Hamilton (l. 136) mentions "Wheat, Pulse, and Butter" as exports from Mungarou on this coast. He does not mention Bosmoron!

of the vulture family, a circumstance which possibly may indicate the source of the Arabic name, as we know it to be of some at least of the legends.

In one of the notes just referred to it is suggested that the roc's quills, spoken of by Marco Polo in the passage quoted below (a passage which evidently refers to some real object brought to China), might possibly have been some vegetable production such as the great frond of the Ravenala of Madagascar (Urania speciosa), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Sibree, in his excellent book on Madagascar (The Great African Island, 1880) noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rofia palm (Sagus Raphia). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England. These must have been originally from 36 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all stript, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Broddingnagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1884. Sir John Kirk wrote :

"I send to-day per S.S. Arcot . . . four fronds of the Raphia palm, called here Moale. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state—i.e. stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making stages and ladders, and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths, and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Bagamoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and these declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated this statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Udoe (?) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself says that 'what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale' (see letter of the present writer in Atlanæum, March 22nd, 1884).

(c. 1000?). "El Haçan fils d'Amr et d'autres, d'après ce qu'ils tenaient de maints personnages de l'Inde, m'ont rapporté des choses bien extraordinaires, au sujet des oiseaux du pays de Zabadj, de Khmér (Kumâr) du Senf et autres régions des parages de l'Inde. Ce que j'ai vu de plus grand, en fait de plumes d'oiseaux, c'est un tuyau que me montra Abou' l-Abbas de Siraf. Il était long de deux aunes environs capable, semblait-il, de contenir une outre, d'eau.

"J'ai vu dans l'Inde, me dit le capitaine Ismaïlawéih, chez un des principaux mars chands, un tuyau de plume qui était près de sa maison, et dans lequel on versait de l'eau comme dans une grande tonne . . . Ne sois pas étonné, me dit-il, car un capitaine du pays des Zindjs m'a conté qu'il avait vu chez le roi de Sira, un tuyau de plume qui contenait vingt-cinq outres d'eau."—Livre des Merveilles d'Inde. (Par Van der Lith et Marcel Devic, pp. 62-63).

Rogue (Elephant), s. An elephant (generally, if not always, a male) living in apparent isolation from any herd, usually a bold marauder, and a danger to travellers. Such an elephant is called in Bengal, according to Williamson, sawn, i.e. sān; sometimes, it would seem, gundā,* and by the Sinhalese hora.

The term rogue is used by Europeans in Ceylon, and its origin is somewhat obscure. Sir Emerson Tennent finds such an elephant called, in a curious book of last century ronkedor or runkedor, of which he supposes that rogue may perhaps have been a modification. That word looks like Port. roncador, 'a snorer, a noisy fellow, a bully,' which gives a plausible sense. But Littré gives rogue as a colloquial French word conveying the idea of arrogance and rudeness. In the following passage which we have copied, unfortunately without recording the source, the word comes still nearer the sense in which it is applied to the Elephant: "On commence à s'apercevoir des Bayonne, que l'humeur de ces peuples tient vn peu de celle de ses voisins, et qu'ils sont rogues et peu communicatifs avecl'Étranger." After all however it is most likely that the term is derived from an English use of the word. For Skeat shows that rogue, from the French sense of 'malapert, saucy, rude, surly,' came to be applied as a cant term to beggars, and is used, in some old English passages which he quotes, exactly in the sense of our modern 'tramp.' The transfer to a vagabond elephant would be easy. Mr. Skeat refers to Shakspeare:—

"And wast thou fain, poor father, To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn?" K. Lear, iv. 7.

1878. "Much misconception exists on the subject of rogue or solitary elephants. The usually accepted belief that these elephants are turned out of the herds by their companions or rivals is not correct. Most of the so-called solitary elephants are the lords of some herds near. They leave their companions at times to roam by themselves, usually to visit cultivation or open country . . . sometimes again they make the expedition merely for the sake of solitude. They, however, keep more or less to the jungle where their herd is, and follow its movements."—Sunderson, p. 52.

Rohilla, n.p. A name by which Afghāns, or more particularly Afghāns settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province of Rohilkhand, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rōhēlah or rōhēlai, adj., formed from rōhu, 'mountain,' thus signifying 'mountaineer of Afghānistān.' But a large part of Eastern Afghanistan specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Fall of the Moghul Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when 'Ali Mahommed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta.

A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: "The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of an ode in that language, 'Sādik Rohilai yam pa Hindubār gad,' meaning, 'I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan;' i.e., an honest man among knaves."

c. 1432. "The King . . . issued farmāns to the chiefs of the various Afghān Tribes. On receipt of the farmāns, the Afghāns of Roh came as is their wont, like ants and locusts, to enter the King's service. . . . The King (Bahlol Lodi) commanded his nobles, saying,—'Every Afghān who comes to Hind from the country of Roh to enter my service, bring him to me. I will give him a jāgir more than proportional to his deserts.'—Tarikh-i-Shir-Shāhi, Elliot, iv. 307.

c. 1542. "Actuated by the pride of power, he took no account of clanship, which is much considered among the Afghans, and especially among the Rohilla men."—Ibid. 428.

c. 1612. "Roh is the name of a particular mountain [-country], which extends in length from Swād and Bajaur to the town of Siwi belonging to Bhakar. In breadth it stretches from Hasan Abdāl to Kābul. Kandahār is situated in this territory."—Firishta's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 568.

1745. "This year the Emperor, at the request of Suffder Jung, marched to reduce Ali Mahumud Khan, a Rohilla adventurer, who had, from the negligence of the Government, possessed himself of the district of Kutteer, and assumed independence of the royal authority."—In Vol. II. of Scott's E. T. of Hist. of the Dekkan, &c., p. 218.

1786. "That the said Warren Hastings . . . did in September, 1773, enter into a private engagement with the said Nabob of Oude . . . to furnish them, for a stipulated sum of money to be paid by the E. I. Company, with a body of troops for the declared purpose of 'thoroughly extirpating the nation of the Rohillas;' a nation from whom the Company had never received, or pretended to receive, or apprehend, any injury whatever."—Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vi. 568.

Rolong, s. Used in S. India, and formerly in W. India, for fine flour; semolina, or what is called in Bengal soojee (q.v.). The word is a corruption of Portuguese rolão or ralão. But this is explained by Bluteau as farina secunda. It is, he says (in Portuguese) that substance which is extracted between the best flour and the bran.

"1813: "Some of the greatest delicacies in India are now made from the rolong-flour, which is called the heart or kidney of the wheat."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 47.

Rook, s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukḥ, which is properly the name of the fabulous gryphon, the roc of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rath or 'chariot,' the name of the piece in India.

Room, n.p. 'Turkey' (Rūm); Roomee, n.p. (Rūmī); 'an Ottoman Turk.' Properly 'a Roman.' In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as 'a Latin'—represented in later times by Feringhi (e.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under Raja). But Rūm, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire, after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. Garcia De Orta and Jarric deny the name of Rūmī, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rūmī; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes distinctively call Turks) as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

c. 1508. "Ad haec, trans euripum, seu fretum, quod insulam fecit, in orientali continentis plaga oppidum condidit, receptaculum advenis militibus, maximo Turcis; ut ab Diensibus freto divisi, rixandi cum iis . . . causas procul haberent. Bandar-i-Rūmī is, as the traveller explains, the 'Port of the Turks.' Gogala, a suburb of Diu on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as Villa dos Rumes (see Gogalla, and quotation from Maffei above). The quotation below from Damian a Goes alludes apparently to Gogala.

Roomaul, s. Hind. from Pers. rūmāl (lit. 'face-rubber'), a towel, a handkerchief. In ordinary Anglo-Indian Hind. it is the word for a 'pocket handkerchief.' In modern trade it is applied to thin silk piece-goods with handkerchief-patterns. We are not certain of its meaning in the old trade of piece-goods, e.g.:

1726. "Roemaals, 80 pieces in a pack, 45 ells long, 1½ broad."—Valentijn, v. 178.

Rūmāl was also the name technically used by the Thugs (q.v.) for the handkerchief with which they strangled their victims.

Rosalgat, Cape, n.p. The most easterly point of the coast of Arabia: a corruption, (originally Portuguese) of the Arabic name Rās-al-hadd, as explained by P. della Valle, with his usual acuteness and precision, below.

Rottle, Rattle, s. Arab. raṭl or ritl, the Arabian pound, becoming in S. Italian rotolo, in Port. arratel, in Sp. arrelde; supposed to be originally a transposition of the Greek λίτρον, which went all over the Semitic East. It is in Syriac as litrā; and is also found as litrīm (pl.) in a Phoenician inscription of Sardinia, dating c. B.C. 180 (see Corpus Inscripti. Semiti. i. 188-189).

Round, s. This is used as a Hind. word, raund, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.'

Roundel, s. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-guard on a lance, as we learn from Bluteau's great Port. Dictionary: "Arundela, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England."

Cobarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing.

Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is, even in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel.

A young fellow of humour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squaredel instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbade him the use of it."—Ives, 21.

1785. "He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his roundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun."—Carraccioli, i. 283.

This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

Rowannah, s. Hind. from Pers. rawānah, from rawā, 'going.' A pass or permit.

Rowce, n. p. H. raus, rois. A Himalayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking sticks, Cotoneaster bacillaris, Wall., also Cotoneaster acuminata (N.O. Rosaceae).

Rownee, s. (a). A fausse-braye, i.e., a subsidiary enceinte surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. raonī. The word is not in Shakespeare, nor in Wilson. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations.

(b). This word also occurs as representative of the Burmese yo-wet-ni, or (in Arakan pron.) ro-wet-ni ('red-leaf'), the technical name of the standard silver of the Burmese ingot currency, commonly rendered "flowered-silver" (q.v.)

1799. "On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the glacis) because the guns could not bear upon the rounee."—Jas. Skinner's Mil. Memoirs, i. 172.

J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets rounee here as 'counterscarp.' But that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

In a work by Major L. F. Smith (Sketch of the Rise, &c., of the Regular Corps in the service of the Native Princes of India, Calcutta and London, 1805) we find a plan of the attack of Aligarh, in which is marked "Lower Fort or Renny, well supplied with grape," and again, "Lower Fort, Renny or Faussebraye."

1796. "Rouni or finesilver, Ummerapoor currency."—Notification in Seton Karr, ii. 179.

1800. "The quantity of alloy varies in the silver current in different parts of the empire; at Rangoon it is adulterated 25 per cent.; at Ummerapoor, pure, or what is called flowered silver is most common; in the latter all duties are paid. The modifications are as follows:

"Rouni, or pure silver.

Rounika, 5 per cent. of alloy."

Roy, s. A common mode of writing the title rāi (vide Raja); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hindu Theist Rammohun Roy.

Roza, s. Arab. rauḍa, in Hind. pron. rauḍa. Properly a garden; and then a mausoleum; among the Arabs especially the rauḍa of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by natives the Tāj-rauḍa); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzib near Aurungābād.

1813. "... the roza, a name for the mausoleum, but implying something saintly or sanctified."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iv. 41.

Rozye, s. Hind. razāi and rajāi; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind. with the Arabic letter zawād; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning 'a cover for the head in winter.' The kindred meaning of Mirzāi (v. Meerzye) is apt to suggest a connexion between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word factitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespear's suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. raiḥika, 'cloth.' The most probable suggestion perhaps is that razāi was a word taken from the name of some person called Razā, who may have invented some variety of the article; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c.

Since the preceding words were written we see that a somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Dict. called Bahār-i-Ajam, extracted by Vüllers (s.v.) seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the term.

1834. "I arrived in a small open pavilion at the top of the building, in which there was a small Brahminy cow, clothed in a wadded resai, and lying upon a carpet."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 135.

Rum, s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, rome for 'good'; rome-booze, 'good drink'; and so, rum. The English word has with us always a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Gorresio in his Italian version of the Ramāyana, whilst describing the Palace of Ravana, is bold enough to speak of its being pervaded by "an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop" (iii. 292).

Rum-johnny, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both we believe, obsolete.

(a). It was applied, according to Williamson (V. M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Ramazāni, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahomedan names.

1810. "Generally speaking, the present banians, who attach themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversy, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-Johnnies 'of a larger growth.'"—Williamson, V. M., i. 191.

(b). Among soldiers and sailors, 'a prostitute'; from Hind. rāmjanī, 'a dancing-girl.'

1814. "I lived near four years within a few miles of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the ramjannies or dancing-girls attached to the temples, in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctified indolence unknown in colder climates."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iii. 6.

Rumna, s. Hind. a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1760. "Abdal Chab Cawn murdered at the Rumna in the month of March, 1760, by some of the Hercarabs. . . ."—Van Sittart, i. 63.

1792. "The Peshwa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his rumna (read rumna), or park, about four miles from Poonah. . . ."—Sir C. Malet, in Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. (See also verses quoted under Pawnee.)

Runn (of Cutch), n. p. Hind. Ran. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-waste, often covered by high tides, or by land-floods, which extends between the peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. irīṇa or irīṇa, 'a salt-swamp, a desert.' The Runn is first mentioned in the Periplus, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

c. A.D. 80-90. "But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irinon, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift continual eddies extending far from the land."—Periplus, § 40.

c. 1370. "The guides had maliciously misled them into a place called the Kūnchiran. In this place all the land is impregnated with salt, to a degree impossible to describe."—Shams-i-Sirāj-Arif, in Elliot, iii. 324.

1583. "Muzaffar fled, and crossed the Ran, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jessalmir. In some places the breadth of the water of the Ran is 10 kos and 20 kos. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of the water."—Tabaqāt-i-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 440.

c. 1590. "Between Chalwanah, Sircar Ahmedabad, Putten, and Surat, is a low tract of country, 90 cose in length, and in breadth from 7 to 30 cose, which is called Run. Before the commencement of the periodical rains, the sea swells and inundates this spot, and leaves by degrees after the rainy season."—Ayeen (Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 71).

1849. "On the morning of the 24th I embarked and landed about 6 p.m. in the Runn of Sindh.

"... a boggy syrtis, neither sea
Nor good dry land."

Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 14.

Rupee, s. Hind. rūpiya, from Skt. rūpya, 'wrought silver.' The standard coin of the Anglo-Indian monetary system, as it was of the Mahomedan Empire that preceded us. It is commonly stated (as by Wilson, in his article on this word, which contains much valuable and condensed information) that the rupee was introduced by Sher Shāh (in 1542). And this is, no doubt, formally true; but it is certain that a coin substantially identical with the rupee, i.e. approximating to a standard of 100 ratis (or 175 grs. troy) of silver, an ancient Hindu standard, had been struck by the Mahomedan sovereigns of Delhi in the 13th and 14th centuries, and had formed an important part of their currency. In fact, the capital coins of Delhi, from the time of Iyaltimish (A.D. 1211-1236) to the accession of Mahommed Tughlak (1325) were gold and silver pieces, respectively of the weight just mentioned. We gather from the statements of Ibn Batuta and his contemporaries that the gold coin, which the former generally calls tanga, and sometimes gold dīnār, was worth 10 of the silver coin, which he calls dīnār, thus indicating that the relation of gold to silver value was, or had recently been, as 10:1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great "depreciation of gold" (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1330) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 175 grs. was re-adopted for gold, and was maintained to the time of Sher Shāh. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed's successor Feroz Shāh, Mr. E. Thomas's examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodi dynasty (i.e. 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into a state of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrafis and dīrlams, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humāyūn, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shāh as above-mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of rūpiya, which name has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coins so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are 4 specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears obv. 'THE RYPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. BY AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND; rev. KING OF GREAT BRITAIN. FRANCE. AND. IRELAND.' Wt. 167.8 gr. The fourth bears obv. 'HON. SOC. ANG. IND. ORI.' with a shield; rev. 'A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM:—MON. BOMBAY. ANGLIC. REGIM'. A° 7°.' Weight 177.8 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz., the Sikka (see Sicca) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs., and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Farakhābād, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165.215 of pure silver; the Benares Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174.76 grs., and contained 168.875 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chalāni or 'current' rupee of account, in which the Company's accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikkas. The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178.32 grs.; its pure silver 164.94. The Rupee at Madras (where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see pagoda) was originally that of the Nawāb of the Carnatic (or 'Nabob of Arcot') and was known usually as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 169.20 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other,

* The term Sonant rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and unification of the Anglo-Indian coinage in 1833, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly sanvat, pl. of Ar. sanat(n), a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, coins deteriorated in value, in comparison with the rupee of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed Sonant or Sonants. But in 1773, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 19th san or year of Shāh 'Alam (the Mogul then reigning). And in all later uses of the term sonant it appears to be equivalent in value to the farakhābād rupee, or the modern "Company's Rupee" (which was of the same standard).

perhaps from commerce between those places and the 'Coast,' the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) "formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and Dacca Mints." (1)*

These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (without any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with more minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional Sicca in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The Sicca was abolished as a coin by Act XIII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight and 165 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Furruckabad Rupee.

1771. "We fear the worst however ; that is, that the Government are about to interfere with the Company in the management of Affairs in India. Whenever that happens it will be high Time for us to decamp. I know the Temper of the King's Officers pretty well, and however they may decry our manner of acting they are ready enough to grasp at the Rupees whenever they fall within their Reach."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, March 31.

Russud, s. P. rasad. The provision of grain, forage, and other necessities got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège.

The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian mouth.

Rut, s. Hind. rath, a chariot. Now applied to a native carriage, drawn by a pony, and used by women on a journey.

Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days.

1829. "This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—John Shipp, ii. 183. See under Book.

Ruttee, Rettee, s. Hind. rattī (Skt. raktikā, from rakta, 'red'). The seed of a leguminous creeper (Abrus precatorius, L.), sometimes called country liquorice,—a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot,—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith's weight, and known in England as 'Crab's eyes.' Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient rattī may be taken as equal to 1.75 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., Pt. I., pp. 12-14). This work of Mr. Thomas's contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of basing standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Manu :—

" . . . viii. 132. The very small mote which may be discerned in a sun-beam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a trasareṇu. 133. Eight of these trasareṇus are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (likhyā), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (rāja-sarshapa), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaura-sarshapa). 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (yava), three such barley-corns to one krishṇala (or raktika), five krishṇalas of gold are one māsha, and sixteen such māshas one suvarṇa," etc. (Ib., p. 13).

In the Āin, Abdul Fazl calls the rattī surkh, which is a translation (Pers. for 'red'). In Persia the seed is called chashm-i-khūris, 'Cock's eye' (see Blochmann's E. T., i., 16 n.).

c. 1676. "At the Mine of Soumelpour in Bengala, they weigh by Rati's, and the Rati is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half."—Tavernier, E.T., ii. 140.

Ryot, s. Arab. ra'yat (from ra'ā, 'to pasture'), meaning originally, according to its etymology, 'a herd at pasture ;' but then 'subjects' (collectively). It is by natives used for 'a subject' in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to 'a tenant of the soil ;' an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator.

In Turkey the word, in the form raiya, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Kharāj (or Jizya, see Jezya).

1776. "For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment . . . and the Ryots were nourished with piety and morality."—Halhed, Gentoo Code, 41.

1789.

"To him in a body the Ryots complain'd That their houses were burnt, and their cattle distract'd."

The Letters of Simplin the Second, &c. 11.

1790. "A raiyyot is rather a farmer than a husbandman."—Colebrooke, in Life, 42.

1809. "The ryots were all at work in their fields."—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1813.

"And oft around the cavern fire
On visionary schemes debate,
To snatch the Rayahs from their fate."
Byron, Bride of Abydos.

1820. "An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayets, the various tenures . . . , the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and soucars respecting loans and advances . . . is essential to a judge."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, ii. 17.

1870. "Ryot is a word which is much . . . misused. It is Arabic, but no doubt comes through the Persian. It means 'protected one,' 'subject,' 'a commoner,' as distinguished from 'Raees' or 'noble.' In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in that of tenant."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 167.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said; it is Raees and Raiyat.

1877. "The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam . . . and the rayahs or infidel subjects of the Sultan, was the payment of haratch or capitation tax."—Finlay, H. of Greece, v. 22 (ed. 1877).

1884. "Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere, except in the Cyclades, . . . seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece; whilst the Rayahs, as the Turks style their non-Mussulman subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the metayer system."—Murray's Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 54.

Ryotwarry, adj. A technicality of modern coinage. Hind. from Pers. ra'iyatwār, formed from the preceding. The ryotwarry system is that under which the settlement for land revenue is made directly by the Government agency with each individual cultivator holding land, not with the village community, nor with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual. It is the system which chiefly prevails in the Madras Presidency; and was elaborated there in its present form mainly by Sir Thomas Munro.

1824. "It has been objected to the ryotwari system that it produces unequal assessment and destroys ancient rights and privileges; but these opinions seem to originate in some misapprehension of its nature."—Minutes, &c., of Sir T. Munro, i. 265. We may observe that the spelling here is not Munro's. The Editor, Sir A. Arbuthnot, has followed a system (see Preface, p. x.): and we see in Gleig's Life (iii. 355) that Munro wrote 'Rayetwar.'

Sadras or Sadraspatam, n.p. This name of a place 42 m. south of Madras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Madraspatam. The correct name is Sadurai, but it is sometimes made into Sadrag- and Shatranjpatam.

Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sandraslapatam, which is probably a misprint for Sandraspatam.

1672. "From Tirepoplier you come . . . to Sadraspatam, where our people have a Factory."—Baldaeus, 152.

1726. "The name of the place is properly Sadragapatam; but for short it is also called Sadrapatam, and most commonly Sadraspatam. In the Tellinga it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means 'thousand troubles' or the Shah-board which we call chess."—Valentijn, Choro-mandel, 11.*

c. 1780. "J'avois pensé que Sadras auroit été le lieu où devoient finir mes contrariétés et mes courses."—Haafner, i. 141.

"Non, je ne suis point Anglois," m'écriai-je avec indignation et transport; 'je suis un Hollandois de Sadringapatnam.'—Id. 191.

1781. "The chief officer of the French now despatched a summons to the English commandant of the Fort to surrender, and the commandant, not being of opinion he could resist . . . evacuated the fort, and proceeded by sea in boats to Sudrang Puttun."—H. of Hydur Naik, 447.

Safflower, s. The flowers of the annual Carthamus tinctorius, L. (N. O. Compositae), a considerable article of export from India for use as a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed 'bastard saffron.' The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the 'striving after meaning.' For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, usfur. This word we find in medieval trade-lists (e.g., in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as asfiore, asfrole, astifore, zaffrole,

saffiore; from the last of which the transition to safflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna it seems to be called Crocus hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given hasfor.

Another Arabic name for this article is kurzum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist's carthamus. In Hind. it is called kusumbha.

Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

c. 1200. "ʿUṣfur . . . . Abu Hanīfa. This plant yields a colouring matter, used in dyeing. There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurzum."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 196.

c. 1343. "Affiore vuol esser fresco, e asciutto, e colorito rosso in colore di buon zafferano, e non giallo, e chiaro a modo di femminella di zafferano, e che non sia trasandato, che quando è vecchio e trasandato si spolverizza, e fae vermini."—Pegolotti, 372.

1612. "The two Indian ships aforesaid did discharge these goods following. . . . osfar, which is a red die, great quantitie."—Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1810. "Le safran bâtarde ou carthame, nommé dans le commerce safranon, est appelé par les Arabes . . . osfour ou . . . Kortom. Suivant M. Sonnini, le premier nom désigne la plante; et le second, ses graines."—Silv. de Sacy, Note on Abdalatif, p. 123.

1813. "Safflower (Cussom, Hind., Asfour, Arab.) is the flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus tinctorius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste."—Milburn, ii. 238.

Saffron, s. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called açafrão da terra ('country saffron.') The Hind. name is haldī, or in the Deccan halad. Garcia de Orta calls it croco Indico, 'Indian saffron.' Indeed, Dozy shows that the Arab. kurzum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. curcuma) is probably taken from the Greek κρόκος or obl. κρόκον.

Moodeen Sherif says that kurzum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1200. "The Persians call this root al-Hard, and the inhabitants of Basra call it al-Kurkum, and al-Kurkum is Saffron. They call these plants Saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does."—Ibn Baithar, ii. 370.

1563. "R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call 'country saffron.'

"O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arabia and Persia. In this city (Goa) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e. in Cananor and Calcut. The Canarins call the root alad; and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it mangale, and the Malays curhet; the Persians, darzard, which is as much as to say 'yellow-wood.' The Arabs call it habet; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India."—Garcia, D'O., f. 78 v. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1726. "Curcuma, or Indian Saffron."—Valentiñ, Chor. 42.

Sago, s. From Malay sāgū. The farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metroxylon laeve, Mart., and M. Rumphii, Willd., found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is the proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and N. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1298. "They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330. "But as for the trees which produce flour, tis after this fashion. . . . And the result is the best pasta in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cakes of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Friar Odoric, have eaten."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 92.

1522. "Their bread (in Tidore) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there; then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages."—Piquafetta, Hak. Soc., p. 136.

This is a bad description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree (see that word).

1552. "There are also other trees which are called sagus, from the pith of which bread is made."—Castanheda, vi. 24.

1553. "Generally, although they have some millet and rice, all the people of the Isles of Maluco eat a certain food which they call sagum, which is the pith of a tree like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark."—Barros, III. v. 5.

1579. "... and a Kind of meale which they call Sago, made of the toppes of certaine trees, tasting in the Mouth like some curds, but melts away like sugar."—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc., p. 142.

"Also in a list of 'Certaine Wordes of the Natural Language of Iaua;' "Sagu, bread of the Country."—Hakl. iv. 246.

c. 1690. "Primo Sagus genuina, Malaice Sagu, sive Lapia tuni, h.e. vera Sagu."—Rumphius, i. 75. (We cannot make out the language of lapia tuni.)

1727. "And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagow, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun."—A. Ham. ii. 93.

Sagwire, s. A name applied often in books, and, formerly at least, in the colloquial use of European settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance to its rural economy. The name is Port. sagueira (analogous to palmeira), in Span. of the Indies saguran, and no doubt is taken from sagu, as the tree, though not the sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus Gomutus, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blowpipe (see Sumpitan). "The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of 'hell-water'" (Crawford, Desc. Dict., p. 145).

The term sagwire is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515. "They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur, and of this they make bread."—Giov. da Empoli, 86.

1615. "Oryza tamen magna hic copia, ingens etiam modus arborum quas Saguras vocant, quaeque varia suggerunt commoda."—Jarric, i. 201.

1631. "... tertia frequens est in Banda ac reliquis insulis Moluccis, quae distillat ex arbore non absumilis Palmae Indicae, isque potus indigenis Sagur vocatur..."—Jac. Bontii, Dial. iv. p. 9.

1784. "The natives drink much of a liquor called saguire, drawn from the palm-tree."—Forrest, Mergui, 73.

1820. "The Portuguese, I know not for what reason, and other European nations who have followed them, call the tree and the liquor sagwire."—Crawford, Hist., i. 401.

Sahib, s. The title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sahib, Collector Sahib, Lord Sahib, and even Sergeant Sahib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sahib! 'Sir!'

In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to 'Master;' and it is occasionally used also as a specific title both among Hindus and Musulmans, e.g. Appa Sahib, Tipu Sahib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khan Sahib, Nawab Sahib, Raja Sahib.

The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion;' (sometimes a Companion of Mahommed).

1673. "... To which the subtle Heathen replied, Sahab (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fryer, 417.

1689. "Thus the distracted Husband in his Indian English contest, English fashion, Sab, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Orvington, 326.

1853. "He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Oakfield, ii. 252.

1878. "... Forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 194.

a. Saint John's, n.p. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sindān of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20° 12' and lies 88 m. north of Bombay, and about 66 miles south of Surat, is apparently Sajām (see Hist. of Cambay, in Bo. Govt. Selections, No. xxvi., N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanjān. E. B. Eastwick in J. Bo. Br. B. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "K'isāh-i-Sanjān, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India."

Sanjān is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Umbargām. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanjān is found, for miles round, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302.

c. 1150. "Sindān is 1½ mile from the sea . . . The town is large and has an extensive commerce both in exports and imports."—Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 85.

c. 1599. "When the Dastur saw the soil was good, He selected the place for their residence: The Dastur named the spot Sanjan, And it became populous as the Land of Iran."

c. 1616. "The aldea Nargol . . . in the lands of Daman was infested by Malabar Moors in their parós, who commonly landed there for water and provisions, and plundered the boats that entered or quitted the river, and the passengers who crossed it, with heavy loss to the aldeas adjoining the river, and to the revenue from them, as well as to that from the custom-house of Sangens."—Bocarro, Decada, 670.

1623. "La mattina seguente, fatto giorno, scoprimmo terra di lontano . . . in un luogo poco discosto da Bassain, che gl' Inglesi chiamano Terra di San Giovanni; ma nella carta da navigare vidi esser notato, in lingua Portoghese, col nome d'ilhas das vaccas, o 'isole delle vacche' al modo nostro."—P. della Valle, ii. 500.

1630. "It happened that in safety they made to the land of St. Johns on the shoares of India."—Lord, The Religion of the Parsees, 3.

1644. "Besides these four posts there are in the said district four Tanadarías, or different Captainships, called Sangés (St. John's), Dani, Maim, and Trapor."—Bocarro (Port. MS.).

1673. "In a Week's Time we turned it up, sailing by Baçein, Tarapore, Valentine's Peak, St. John's, and Daman, the last City northward on the Continent, belonging to the Portuguese."—Fryer, 82.

1808. "They (the Parsee emigrants) landed at Dieu, and lived there 19 years; but, disliking the place . . . the greater part of them left it and came to the Guzerat coast, in vessels which anchored off Seyjan, the name of a town."—R. Drummond.

1813. "The Parsees or Guebres . . . continued at this place (Diu) for some time, and then crossing the Gulph, landed at Suzan, near Nunsaree, which is a little to the southward of Surat."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 109.

1841. "The high land of St. John, about 3 leagues inland, has a regular appearance . . ."—Horsburgh's Directory, ed. 1841, i. 470.

1872. "In connexion with the landing of the Parsis at Sanjān, in the early part of the 8th century, there still exist copies of the 15 Sanskrit Slokas, in which their Mobeds explained their religion to Jadé Rānā, the Rāja of the place, and the reply he gave them."—Ind. Antig., i. 214. The Slokas are given. See them also in Doshai Framji's Hist. of the Parsees (1884), i. 31.

b. St. John's Island, n.p. This again is a corruption of Sau-Shan, the Chinese name of an island at the mouth of Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1687. "We came to Anchor the same Day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 22 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quantung or Canton in China."—Dum-pier, i. 406.

1727. "A Portuguese Ship . . . being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa."—A. Ham. i. 252.

1780. "St. John's," in Dunn's New Directory, 472.

c. St. John's Islands. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sikajang.

Saiva, s. A worshipper of Śiva; Skt. Saiva, adj., 'belonging to Śiva.'

1651. "The second sect of the Brāmins,

'Seivla' . . . by name, say that a certain Envara is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him."—Rogerus, 17.

1867. "This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest shrine in India, at least among the Shaivites."—Bp. Milman, in Memoirs, p. 48.

Sala, s. H.—sālā, 'brother-in-law,' i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

1881. "Another of these popular Paris sayings is 'et ta sœur?' which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark sālā, 'brother-in-law,' is to a Hindoo."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, 320.

Salaam, s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Mahomedans to each other. Arab. salām, 'peace.' Used for any act of salutation; or for 'compliments.'

1518. "The ambassador (of Bisnagar) entering the door of the chamber, the Governor rose from the chair on which he was seated, and stood up whilst the ambassador made him great calema."—Correa, Lendas, II. i. 377. See also p. 481.

1552. "The present having been seen he took the letter of the Governor, and read it to him, and having read it told him how the Governor sent him his calema, and was at his command with all his fleet, and with all the Portuguese . . ."—Castanheda, iii. 445.

1611. "Calema. The salutation of an inferior."—Cobarruvias, Sp. Dict., s. v.

1626. "Hee (Selim, i.e. Jahāngir) turneth over his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himself to the people to receive their salames or good morrow . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 523.

1638. "En entrant ils se salient de leur Salem qu'ils accompagnent d'une profonde inclination."—Mandelstlo, Paris, 1659, 223.

1648. "... this salutation they call salam; and it is made with bending of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head."—Van Twist, 55.

1689. "The Salem of the Religious Bramins, is to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out."—Ovington, 183.

1694. "The Town Conicopolies, and chief inhabitants of Egmore, came to make their Salaam to the President."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1717. "I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schalam."—Phillips's Acct. 62.

1809. "The old priest was at the door, with his head uncovered, to make his sa-laams."—Ld. Valentia, i. 273.

1813.

"'Ho! who art thou?'—'This low salam Replies, of Moslem faith I am.'"

Byron, The Giaour.

1832. "Il me rendit tous les salams que je fis autrefois au Grand Mogol."—Jacquemont, Corresp., ii. 137.

1844. "All chiefs who have made their salam are entitled to carry arms personally."—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

Saleb, Salep, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures,' but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Baithar with the Satyrium of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Arabic (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khusi-al-tha'lab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis;' but it is commonly known in India as salep-misry, i.e. Salep of Egypt (tha'lab misri).

In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Eulophia, found in Kashmir and the Lower Himālaya.

Saloop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared.

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salif; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognized the word tha'lab in its Indian pronunciation:

c. 1340. "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian riṭls of flour . . . 1000 of meat, a large number of riṭls (how many I don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of salif, of areca, and 1000 leaves of betel."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 382.

1727. "They have a fruit called Salob, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard . . . and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are . . . They are of opinion that it is a great Restorative."—A. Ham, i. 125.

1838. "Saleb Misree, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritive for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each. . . . It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce."—Desc. of articles found in Bazars of Cabool. In Punjab Trade Report, 1862, App. vi.

1882 (?). "Here we knock against an ambulant salep-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against roaming oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, pedlars with cakes, fellows offering dainty little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser."—Levkosia, The Capital of Cyprus, ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

Salem, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Shēlam, which is perhaps a corruption of Chera, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced.

Salempoory, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under Palempore.

c. 1780. "... et l'on y fabriquoit différentes espèces de toiles de coton, telles que salempouris."—Haafner, ii. 461.

Saligram, s. Skt. Śālagrāma (this seems to be properly the name of a place, 'Village of the Śāl-tree,'—a real or imaginary tirtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahābhārat). A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Sōn, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil ammonite. The śālagrāma is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the brahmans; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine.

In May 1883 a śālagrāma was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindūs of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question rose regarding the identity of a śālagrām, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindūs, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into court, because of the coir-matting, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Ilbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengallee newspaper, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted civil service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

c. 1590. "Salgram is a black stone which the Hindoos hold sacred. . . . They are found in the river Sown, at the distance of 40 cose from the mouth."—Ayeen, Gladwin's E. T., 1800, ii. 25.

1782. "Avant de finir l'histoire de Vichenou, je ne puis me dispenser de parler de la pierre de Salagraman. Elle n'est autre chose qu'une coquille pétrifiée du genre des cornes d'Ammon: les Indiens prétendent qu'elle représente Vichenou, parcequ'ils en ont découvert de neuf nuances différentes, ce qu'ils rapportent aux neuf incarnations de ce Dieu. . . . Cette pierre est aux sectateurs de Vichenou ce que le Lingam est à ceux de Chiven."—Sonnerat, i. 307.

Sallabad s. This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exactions of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, sālābād, 'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a factitious word from P. sāl, 'year,' and Ar. ābād, 'ages.'

1703. "... although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Sallabad (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not recited here as grievances."—In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716. "The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions:—That for anything that has yet appeared the Comatees may cry out their Fennagundoo

* Like the Baetylion which the Greeks got through the Semitic nations. In Photius there are extracts from Damascius (Life of Isidorus the Philosopher), which speak of the stones called Baetylus and Baetylion, which were objects of worship, gave oracles, and were apparently used in healing. These appear, from what is stated, to have been meteoric stones. There were many in Lebanon (see Phot. Biblioth., ed. 1658, pp. 1047, 1062-3).

Nagarum . . . at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c., according to Salabad, but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillary . . .”—Ibid. 234.

1788. “Sallabaud. (Usual Custom). A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present.”—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

Salootree, Salustree, s. Hind. Sālotar, Sālōtrī. A native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahomedan. But the word is taken from the Skt. name Sālīhotra, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists, in a form more or less modified and imperfect.

“A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th cent.), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyāsu-d din Muhammad Shāh Khiljī. This rare book, called Kurruṭul-Mulh, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Sālotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brāhman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says the translation was made ‘from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels’” (**Elliot*, v. 573-4).

Salsette, n. p. (a). A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive caves of Kānhēri (see Kennerly). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Q. Catharine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Mahrattas took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the island (Salinas). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shāshṭī, from Shāshashṭī, meaning ‘Sixty-six’ (Skt. Shat-shashṭī), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages.

(b). Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Velhas Conquistas or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1) the Ilhas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsette on the southern mainland. The port of Marmagaon, which will be the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsette.

The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsette; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Tiçoari, meaning, (Mahr.) Tis-wādī, “30 hamlets.”

A.D. 1186. “I, Aparāditya (“the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Koṅkana, the most illustrious King”) have given with a libation of water 24 drachms, after exempting other taxes, from the fixed revenue of the oart in the village of Mahauli, connected with Shat-shashṭī.”—Inscription edited by Pandit Bhagavānlāl Indrajī, in J. Bo. Br. R. A. S. xii.

1538. “Beyond the Isle of Elephanta (do Alifante) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues long by 5 in breadth. On the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephanta, on the east the mainland, and on the west the I. of Bombai or of Boa Vida. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts, and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city called Thana; and a league and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete; both one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (destruição), and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen."—João de Castro, Primo Roteiro da Índia, 69-70.

"He has under him 12 peons (piães) of whom the said governor takes 7; leaving him 5, which at the aforesaid rate amount to 10,800 reis.

"And to a Parvu (see Parvoe) that he has, who is the country writer . . . and having the same pay as the Tanadar Mor, which is 3 pardaos a month, amounting in a year at the said rate to 10,800 reis."—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsídios, 211-212.

1610. "Frey Manuel de S. Mathias, guardian of the convent of St. Francis in Goa, writes me that . . . in Goa alone there are 90 resident friars; and besides in Bacaim and its adjuncts, viz., in the island of Salsete, and other districts of the north they have 18 parishes (freguezias) of native Christians with vicars; and five of the convents have colleges, or seminaries where they bring up little orphans; and that the said Ward of Goa extends 300 leagues from north to south."—Livros das Monções, 298.

c. 1760. "It was a melancholy sight on the loss of Salsett, to see the many families forced to seek refuge on Bombay, and among them some Portuguese Hidalgos or noblemen, reduced of a sudden from very flourishing circumstances to utter beggary."—Grose, i. 72.

1808. "The Island of Sashy (corrupted by the Portuguese into Salsette) was conquered by that Nation in the year of Christ 1534, from the Mohammedan Prince who was then its Sovereign; and thereupon parcelled out, among the European subjects of Her Most Faithful Majesty, into village allotments, at a very small Foro or quit-rent."—Bombay Regn. I. of 1808; sec. ii.

1510. "And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and Antruz, scouring the districts and the tanadars, and placing in them by his own hand tanadars and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, insomuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money."—Correa, ii. 161.

1546. "We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Idalxa promise and swear on our Koran (no novo mofaffo), and by the head of my eldest son, that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Bardees, which I have made contract and donation of to His Highness, I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idalxa, who was formerly called Idalgão (Adil Khān).—Botelho, Tombo, 40.

1598. "On the South side of the Island of Goa, where the river runneth againe into the Sea, there commeth euen out with the coast a land called Salsette, which is also vnder the subiection of the Portingales, and is . . . planted both with people and fruite."—Linschoten, 51.

1602. "Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1546) Idalxa (Adil Shah) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Salsete and Bardés, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of these Moor Kings of Visiapor."—Couto, IV., x. 4.

Salwen, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lu-kiang. The Burmese form is Than-lwen, but the original form is probably Shān.

Sambook, s. Ar. sanbuk,* and sunbuk, a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. It is smaller than the bagalā (see Buggalow), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go inside the reefs. Burton renders the word "a foyst," which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in last quotation below.

c. 330. "It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Makdashau) that the Sultan's sunbuk boards her to ask whence the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."—Ibn Babuta, ii. 183, also see pp. 17, 181, etc.

1498. "The Zambuco came loaded with doves'-dung, which they have in those islands, and which they were carrying, it being merchandize for Cambay, where it is used in dying cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

"In the curious Vocabulary of the language of Calicut, at the end of the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, we find: "Barcas; Cambuco."

1506. "Questo Capitano si prese uno sambuco molto ricco, veniva dalla Mecha per Colocut."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, 17.

1510. "As to the names of their ships, some are called Sambuchi, and these are flat-bottomed."—Varthema, 154.

1516. "Item—our Captain Major, or Captain of Cochim shall give passes to secure the navigation of the ships and zanbuquos of their ports . . . provided they do not carry spices or drugs that we require for our cargoes, but if such be found, for the first occasion they shall lose all the spice and drugs so loaded, and on the second they shall lose both ship and cargo, and all may be taken as prize of war."—Treaty of Lopo Soares with Coulião (Quilão), in Botelho, Tombo, Subsídios, p. 32.

1518. See quotation under Prow.

1543. "Item—that the Zanbuquos which shall trade in his port in rice or nele (paddy) and cottons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Martin Affonso de Sousa with Coulan in Botelho, Tombo, 37.

1855. "Our pilgrim ship . . . was a Sambuk of about 400 ardébs (50 tons), with narrow wedge-like bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undecked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular latine . . ."—Burton, Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Meccah, i. 276.

1858. "The vessels of the Arabs called Sembuk are small Baggelows of 80 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward into a sharp prow, the after part of the vessel is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a spread that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. von Neimans, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgent. Gesellsch. xii. 420.

1880. "The small sailing boat with one sail, which is called by the Arabs 'Jam-book' with which I went from Hodeida to Aden."—Letter in Athenaeum, March 13th, p. 346.

Sambre, Sambur, s. Hind. sābar, or sāmbar. A kind of stag (Rusa Aris-totelis, Jerdon), the Elk of S. Indian sportsmen; ghaus of Bengal; jerron (jarão) of the Himālaya; the largest of Indian stags, and found in all the large forests of India.

The word is often applied to the soft leather, somewhat resembling chamois leather, prepared from the hide.

1673. ". . . . Our usual diet was of spotted deer, Sabre, wild Hogs, and sometimes wild Cows."—Fryer, 175.

1823. "The skin of the Sambre, when well prepared, forms an excellent material for the military accoutrements of the soldiers of the native Powers."—Malcolm, Cent. India, i. 9.

Sampan, s. A kind of small boat or skiff. The word appears to be javanese and Malay. It must have been adopted on the Indian shores, for it was picked up there at an early date by the Portuguese; and it is now current throughout all the further East. The word is often said to be originally Chinese, 'sampan' = 'three boards,' and this is possible. It is certainly one of the most ordinary words for a boat in China. Moreover there is another kind of boat on the Yangtso which is called wu-pan, 'five boards.*' Giles however says: 'From the Malay sampan = three boards'; but in this there is some confusion. The word has no such meaning in Malay.

1510. "My companion said, 'What means then might there be for going to this island?' They answered: 'That it was necessary to purchase a chiampana, that is a small vessel, of which many are found there.'"—Varthema, 242.

1516. "They (the Moors of Quilacare) perform their voyages in small vessels which they call champana."—Barbosa, 172.

c. 1540. "In the other, whereof the captain was slain, there was not one escaped, for Quiny Panian pursued them in a Champana, which was the Boat of his Junk."—Pinto (Cogan, p. 79), orig. ch. lix.

1552. ". . . . Champanas, which are a kind of small vessels."—Castanheda, ii. 76.

1648. In Van Spilbergen's Voyage we have Champagne, and the still more odd Champaigne.

1702. "Sampans being not to be got we were forced to send for the Sarah and Eaton's Long-boats."—MS. Correspondence in I. Office, from China Factory (at Chusan), Jan. 8th.

c. 1788. "Some made their escape in prows, and some in sampans."—Mem. of a Malay Family, 3.

1868. "The harbour is crowded with men-of-war and trading vessels . . . from vessels of several hundred tons burthen down to little fishing-boats and passenger sampans."—Wallace, Archip. 21.

Samshoo, s. A kind of ardent spirit made in China from rice. Mr. Baber doubts this being Chinese; but according to Wells Williams the name is san-shao, 'thrice fired' (Guide, 220).

* On the authority of Mr. E. C. Baber.

'Distilled liquor' is shao-siu, fired liquor.' Compare Germ. Brantwein, and XXX. beer.

Strabo says: "Wine the Indians drink not except when sacrificing, and that is made of rice in lieu of barley" (xv. c. i. § 53).

1727. "... Samsheu or Rice Arrack."—A. Ham. ii. 222.

c. 1752. "... the people who make the Chinese brandy called Samsu, live likewise in the suburbs."—Osebeck's Voyage, i. 235.

Sānām (?) s. This word occurs in a "Song by a Gentleman of the Navy when a Prisoner in Bangalore Jail" (temp. Hyder 'Ali). The word is, most probably, only a misprint for fanam (q.v.).

1734.

"Ye Bucks of Seringapatam,
Ye Captives so cheerful and gay;
How sweet with a golden sanam
You spun the slow moments away."
In Seton-Karr, i. 19.

Sandal, Sandle, Sanders, Sandalwood, s. From Low Latin santalum, in Greek σάνταλον, and in later Greek σάνδανον; coming from the Arab. ṣandal, and that from Skt. chandana. The name properly belongs to the fragrant wood of the Santalum album, L. Three woods bearing the name of santalum, white, yellow, and red, were in official use in the middle ages. But the name Red Sandalwood, or Red Sanders, has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of Pterocarpus santalina, L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dye-wood. According to Hanbury and Flückiger this last was the sanders so much used in the cookery of the middle ages for colouring sauces, &c.

In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real odorous sandal-wood, or was the wood of Pteroc. sandal. It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, even in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

It has been a question how the Pterocarpus santalina came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East.

c. 545. "And from the remoter regions, I speak of Tzinista and other places of export, the imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, Sandalwood (ῥσάνδανον), and so forth..."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxxvii.

c. 1390. "Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk... and colour it with Sanders."—Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 350.

1554. "Le Santal donc croist es Indes Orientales et Occidentales: en grandes Forestz, et fort espesses. Il s'en treuve trois especes: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur: le blanc apres: le rouge est mis au dernier ranc, pource qu'il n'a aucune odeur: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon."—Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. chap. xix.

1563. "The Sandal grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called chundana; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malacca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it sandal. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus..."—Garcia, f. 185v. He proceeds to speak of the sandalo vermelho as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1613. "... certain renegade Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollanders, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the said fort, at a time when most of the people... were gone to Solor for the Sandal trade, by which they had their living."—Bocarro, Decada, 723.

1615. "Committee to procure the commodities recommended by Capt. Saris for Japan, viz. . . . pictures of wars, steel, skins, sanders-wood."—Sainsbury, i. 380.

1813. "When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the sandal; it is then taken up and . . . . sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide sandal into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour."—Milburn, i. 291.

1825. "REDWOOD, properly RED Sann-ders, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It . . . comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no smell or taste."—Id., ed. 1825, p. 249.

Sandoway, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is Thand-wé (Sand-wé), for which an etymology ('iron-tied'), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual. It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the Sada of Ptolemy.

1553. "In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Affonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island called Negamale, opposite the town of Sodoe, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef. . . ."—Barros, IV. ii. 1.

In I. ix. 1, it is called Sedoe.

1696. "Other places along this Coast subject to this King (of Arracan) are Coromorria, Sedoa, Zura, and Port Magaoni."—Appendix to Ovington, p. 563.

Sanskrit, s. The name of the classical language of the Brahmans, Saṁskṛita, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahmans Sanskrit was the bhāṣa, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the proto-grammarians Pāṇini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a denomination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit' and 'Prakrit' are used in the Bṛihat Samhitā of Varāhamihira, c. A.D. 504, in a chapter on omens (lxxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Mṛichch'hakatikā, transld. by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart;' in the works of Kumārila Bhaṭṭa, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāṇiniyā Sīkṣā, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curious early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahomedan poet Amīr Khusrū of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davanzati in Florence, and dating from 1586. The few words on the subject, of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Grandonic, or the like, from grantha, 'a book' (see Grunt and Grunthum) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century.

A.D. x? "Maitreya. Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song: the woman snuffles like a young cow when the rope is first passed through her nostrils; and the man wheezes like an old Pandit repeating his bead-roll."—The Toy-Cart, E. T. in Wilson's Works, xi. 60.

A.D. y? "Three-and-sixty or four-and-sixty sounds are there originally in Prakrit even as in Sanskrit, as taught by the Svayambhū."—Pāṇiniyā Sīkṣā, quoted in Weber's Ind. Studien (1858) iv. 348. But see also Weber's Akadem. Vorlesungen (1876), p. 194.

1318. "But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brahmans use. Its name from of old is Sahaskrit, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 563.

1586. "Sono scritte le loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Samscruta, che vuol dire 'bene articolata: della quale non si ha memoria quando fusse parlata, con avere (com' io dico) memorie antichissime. Imparanla come noi la greca e la latina, e vi pongono molto maggior tempo, sì che in 6 anni o 7 sene fanno padroni: et ha la lingua d'oggi molte cose comuni con quella, nella quale sono molti de' nostri nomi, e particolarmente de' numeri il 6, 7, 8, e 9, Dio, serpe, et altri assai."—Sassetti, extracted in De Gubernatis, Storia, etc., Livorno, 1875, p. 221.

c. 1590. "Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahanskrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tū, which is the bark of a tree,* which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed out."—Alin (orig.), i, p. 563.

1623. "The Jesuites conceive that the Bramenes are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Bookes (called Samescretan) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 559.

1651. "... Souri signifies the Sun in Samscortam, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Bramines just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Rogerius, 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for :

c. 1666. "Their first study is in the Hanscrit, which is a language entirely different from the common Indian, and which is only known by the Pendets. And this is that Tongue, of which Father Kircher hath published the Alphabet received from Father Roa. It is called Hanscrit, that is, a pure Language; and because they believe this to be the Tongue in which God, by means of Brahma, gave them the four Beths (see Veda), which they esteem Sacred Books, they call it a Holy and Divine Language."—Bernier, E. T. 107.

1673. "... who followed these, their Annals nor their Sanscript deliver not."—Fryer, 161.

1689. "... the learned Language among them is called the Sanscreet."—Ovington, 248.

1694. "Indicus ludus Tchūpur, sic nominatus veterum Brachmanorum lingua Indicè dicta Sanscroot, seu, ut vulgo, exiliori sono elegantiae causâ Sanscreet, non autem Hanscreet ut minus recte eam nuncupat Kircherus."—Hyde, De Ludis Orienti, in Syntagma Diss. ii. 264.

1726. "Above all it would be a matter of general utility to the Coast that some more chaplains should be maintained there for the sole purpose of studying the Sanskrit tongue (de Sanskritze taal) the head-and-mother tongue of most of the Eastern languages, and once for all to make an exact translation of the Vedam or Law book of the Heathen . . . ."—Valentijn, vol. v. Chorom, p. 72.

1760. "They have a learned language peculiar to themselves, called the Hanscrit . . ."—Grose, i. 202.

Sapeca, Sapèque, s. This word is used at Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: "From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochin-China, and equal to about half a pfennig ( $\frac{1}{2}$  Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreutzer" (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin.\* But we can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that given in a note communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baber: "Very probably from Malay sa, 'one,' and paku, 'a string or file of the small coins called pichis.' Pichis is explained by Crawford as 'Small coin . . . money of copper, brass, or tin. . . . It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portuguese.' Paku is written by Favre pekū (Dict. Malais-Français) and is derived by him from Chinese pé-ko, 'cent.' In the dialect of Canton pak is the word for 'a hundred,' and one pak is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash."

Sapeku would then properly be a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of peku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin.

There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha's Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Numismatics, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerque at Goa in 1510 was called cepayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malacca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Albuquerque, and it is quite possible that the dinheiros, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name cepayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Da Cunha, pp. 11-12, and 22).

Sappan-wood, s. The wood of Caesalpinia sappan; the bakkam of the Arabs, and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tamil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan.* The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (gran turco) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayalam shappannam, and the Tamil shappu, both signifying 'red (wood)' are apparently derivatives from shawwa, 'to be red,' and suggest another origin as more probable. The Malay word is also sapang, which Crawford considers to have originated the trade-name. If however the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see Brazil.

Sarbatane, Sarbacane, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Spanish cebratana, cerbatana, zarbatana (also Port. sarabatana, &c., Ital. cerbotana, Mod. Greek ζαροβάρνα), from the Arab. zabātāna, 'a tube for blowing pellets,' (a pea-shooter in fact!)* The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpitan (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is (as it appears) old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word.

The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the mouth by a forcible expiration' (Crawford, Mal. Dict.).

* Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcalá translates zebratana by Ar. zarbatāna.

Sarboji, s. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Colleries (q.v.). See Bp. Caldwell's Hist. of Tinnevely, p. 103 and passim.

Hon. the Governor in Council . . . orders and directs all persons, whether Polygars, Colleries, or other inhabitants possessed of arms in the Provinces of Pindigul, Tinnevely, Ramnadpuram, Sivagangai, and Madura, to deliver the said arms, consisting of Muskets, Matchlocks, Pikes, Gingauls, and Sarabogoi to Lieut.-Col. Agnew . . ."—Proclamation by Madras Govt., dd. 1st Decr., in Bp. Caldwell's Hist., p. 227.

Sarnau, Sornau, n.p. A name often given to Siam in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahr-i-nao (Pers.) 'New-city'; the name by which Yuthia, or Ayodhya, the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf (see Judea). Mr. Braddell (Jo. Ind. Arch., v. 317) has suggested that the name (Sheher-al-navi, as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Loubère between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamese. But this is less probable. We have still a city of Siam called Lophaburi, anciently a capital, and the name of which appears to be a Sanskrit or Pali form, Nava-pura, meaning the same as Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name.

The Cernove of Nicolo Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhaoti or Gaur, an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

1442. "The inhabitants of the sea-coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the counties of Chîn, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbâd, Tenâsiri, Sokotora, Shahr-i-nao . . ."—Abdurrazzak, in Not. et Extraits, xiv. 429.

1510. ". . . They said they were from a city called Sarnau, and had brought for sale silken stuffs, and aloeswood, and benzoin, and musk."—Varthema, 212.

1514. ". . . Tannazzari, Sarnau, where is produced all the finest white benzoin, storax, and lac finer than that of Martaman."—Letter of Giov. d'Empoli, in Arch. Storico Italiano, App. 80.

1540. ". . . all along the coast of Malaya, and within the Land, a great King commands, who for a more famous and commendable Title above all other Kings, causeth himself to be called Prechau Saleu, Emperor of all Sornau, which is a Country wherein there are thirteen kingdoms, by us commonly called Siam" (Sião).—Pinto (orig. cap. xxxvi.), in Cogan, p. 43.

c. 1612. "It is related of Siam, formerly called Sheher-al-Nawi, to which Country all lands under the wind here were tributary, that there was a King called Bubannia, who when he heard of the greatness of Malacca sent to demand submission and homage of that kingdom."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 454.

1726. "About 1340 reigned in the kingdom of Siam (then called Sjaharnouw or Sornau), a very powerful Prince."—Valentijn, v. 319.

Sarong, s. Malay. sāring; the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javanese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran), are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplas) of that coast, and the Labbais (Lubbye) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Bants of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labbais the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawford seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first 'a case or sheath,' and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. sāranga, meaning 'variegated' and also 'a garment.'

1868. "He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket."—Wallace, Mal. Arch. 171.

Satin, s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation connects it with seta, through the Portuguese setim. Dr. Wells Williams (Mid. King., ii. 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese sz'-tün, though intermediately through other languages. It is true that sz' tün or sz'-tuan is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 486; viz. from Zaitün or Zayton (q.v.), the name by which Chwan-chau (or Chin-chew), the great medieval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zaitūnia; the Span. aceytuni (for 'satin'), the medieval French zatonny, and the medieval Italian zetani, afford intermediate steps.

c. 1350. "The first city that I reached after crossing the sea was Zaitün. . . . It is a great city, superb indeed; and in it they make damasks of velvet as well as those of satin (kimkhā—see under Kincob—and atlās, q.v.), which are called from the name of the city zaitūnia."—Ibn Bat., iv. 269.

1352. In an inventory of this year in Doutet d'Arc we have: "Zatonny at 4 écus the ell" (p. 342).

1405. "And besides, this city (Samar-kand) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from Cathay silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern."—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham's at p. 171). The word setuni occurs repeatedly in Clavijo's original.

1440. In the Libro de Gabelli, etc., of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk stuffs, several times, of "zetani vellutati, and other kinds of zetani."—Della Decima, iv. 58, 107, etc.

1441. "Before the throne (at Bijanagar) was placed a cushion of zaitūni satin,* round which three rows of the most exquisite pearls were sewn."—Abdurrazzakh, in Elliot, iv. 120. See also 113.

Satrap, s. Anc. Pers. khshatrapa, which becomes satrap, as khshayathiya becomes shāh. This word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surashtra or peninsular Guzerat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Gīrnār:

c. A.D. 150. "... he, the Mahā-Khshatrapa Rudradāman . . . for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger."—In Indian Antiquary, vii. 262.

The identity of this with satrap was pointed out by James Prinsep, 1838 (J. As. Soc. Ben. vii. 345).

Satsuma, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar cream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615. "I said I had received suffitain at his highnes hands in havinge the good hap to see the face of soe mightie a King as the King of Shashma; whereat he smiled."—Cocks, i. 4-5.

1617. "Speeches are given out that the caboques or Japon players (or whores) going from hence for Tushima to meete the Corean ambassadors, were set on by the way by a boate of Xaxma theeves, and kild all both men and women, for the money they had gotten at Firodo."—Id. 256.

* The original is "darpesh-i-takht bālish az atlas-i-Zaitūni" see Notices et Extraits, xiv. 376. Quatremère (id. 462) translated "un carreau de satin olive," taking zaitūn in its usual Arabic sense of 'an olive-tree.'

Saugor, Saugor Island, n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great fair and pilgrimage—properly Ganga Sâgara ('Ocean Ganges'). It is said once to have been populous, but in 1688 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave. It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683. "We went in our Budgeros to see the Pagodas at Sagor, and returned to ye Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Hedges, MS., March 12.

1684. "James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when ye Island called Gonga Saugor was inhabited, ye Raja of ye Island gathered yearly Rent out of it, to ye amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Id., Dec. 15.

1705. "Sagore est une Isle où il y a une Pagode très-respectée parmi les Gentils, où ils vont en pèlerinage, and où il y a deux Faquers qui y font leur residence. Ces Faquers savent charmer les bêtes féroces, qu'on y trouve en quantité, sans quoi ils seroient tous les jours exposés à estre devorez."—Luillier, p. 123.

1727. "... among the Pagans, the Island Sagor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Jougies go yearly thither in the Months of November and December, to worship and wash in Salt-Water, tho' many of them fall Sacrifices to the hungry Tigers."—A. Ham. ii. 3.

Saul-wood, s. Hind. sâl, from Skt. sâla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N. O. Dipterocarpaceae, which is the most valuable building timber of Northern India. Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himâlaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Biâs; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Goda-very. It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and some other accounts, inferior to teak. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Ain.

The saul has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period on account of its connexion with Buddha's history, and it is known there by the Indian name, as so-lo.*

c. 650. "L'Honorable du siècle, animé d'une grande pitié, et obéissant à l'ordre des temps, jugea utile de paraître dans le monde. Quand il eut fini de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvana. Se plaçant entre deux arbres Sâlas, il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s'endormit."—Hiouen Thsang, Mémoires (Voyages des Pèl. Bouddh., ii. 340).

1765. "The produce of the country consists of shaal timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 200.

1774. "This continued five kos; towards the end there are sâl and large forest trees."—Bogle, in Markham's Tibet, 19.

1810. "The saul is a very solid wood ... it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our firmer woods, sink in fresh water."—Williamson, ii. 69.

Sayer, Syre, etc., s. Hind. from Arab. sâir, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted most essentially to the kind help of Mr. Henry Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the use of the term sayer in this sense was especially great. Wilson, s.v., says:

"In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said: 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was 'the rest of it.'

Sir C. Trevelyan again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word had "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pace tantorum virorum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the last century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zemindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazars, hauts, and gunges) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in sâir two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) sair, producing sâir, 'walking, current,' and sâ-r, producing sâir, 'remainder' — the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the biblical Shear-jashub, 'theremnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges;' an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own word Customs, as well as the dustoor which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of 10 Feby., 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that there arose some confusion with the other sense of sâir, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the meaning of the word.

In a despatch of 10th April, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants;" enjoining that no Buzars or Gunges should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that "all duties coming under the description of Sayer Chelluntah,* and Rahdarry (see Radaree)... and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country" should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zemindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders. And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zemindar in whose zemindarry such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on till 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all Radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On the 11th June, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all the duties indicated into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (28th July) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated 18th July:

"When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collections (the unauthorised articles excepted) for the current year, in order that, by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year . . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them at all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gunges, Bazars, and Hauts," compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

* Chalantia, H. 'in transit.'

The Order of 28th July abolished "all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims at Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of Government . . . the collections made in the Gunges, bazars, and hauts situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of gunges (&c.) by the published Resolutions of 11th June, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries (sometimes included in the sayer under the denomination of phulkur, bunkur, and julkur)* . . ." These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28th, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from 'Land Revenue'; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Accts. presented to Parliament in 1796. In the "Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government" for 1793-94, the "Collections under head of Syer and Abkarry" amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the "Land and Sayer Revenues" are given, but Abkari is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears "Syer Collections, including Abkaree, 7,81,925."

These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9 to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Syer and Abkaree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 shewed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta,
Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto.

* Phalkar, from H. phal, fruit; bankar, from ban, 'forest or pasture-ground'; jalkar, from jal, 'water.'

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1802; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance:—

Under Bengal, Behar, and Orissa:

Sale of Trees and Sunken Boats . . . .	Rs. 555 0 0

1790. "Without entering into a discussion of privileges founded on Custom, and of which it is easier to ascertain the abuse than the origin, I shall briefly remark on the Collections of Sayer, that while they remain in the hands of the Zemindars, every effort to free the internal Commerce from the baneful effects of their vexatious impositions must necessarily prove abortive."—Minute by the Hon. C. Stuart, dd. 10th February, quoted by Lord Cornwallis in his Minute of July 18th.

„ "The Board last day very humanely and politically recommended unanimously the total abolition of the Sayer."

"The statement of Mr. Mercer from Burdwan makes all the Sayr (consisting of a strange medley of articles taxable, not omitting even Hermaphrodites) amount only to 58,000 Rupees . . ."

Minute by Mr. Law of the Bd. of Revenue, forwarded by the Board, 12th July.

1792. "The Jumma on which a settlement for 10 years has been made is about (current Rupees) 3,01,00,000 . . . which is 9,35,691 Rupees less than the Average Collections of the three preceding Years. On this Jumma, the Estimate for 1791-2 is formed, and the Sayer Duties, and some other extra Collections, formerly included in the Land Revenue, being abolished, accounts for the Difference . . ."—Heads of Mr. Dundas's Speech on the Finances of the E. I. Company, 5th June, 1792.

1793. "A Regulation for re-enacting with alterations and modifications, the Rules passed by the Governor General in Council on 11th June and 28th July, 1790, and subsequent dates, for the resumption and abolition of Sayer, or internal Duties and Taxes throughout Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa," etc., etc. "Passed by the Governor General in Council on the 1st May, 1793. . ."—Title of Regulation XXVII. of 1793.

1802. "The Government having reserved to itself the entire exercise of its discretion in continuing or abolishing, temporarily or permanently, the articles of revenue included, according to the custom and practice of the country, under the several heads of salt and saltpetre—of the sayer or duties by sea or land—of the abkarry . . . —of the excise . . . —of all taxes personal and professional, as well as those derived from markets, fairs, and bazaars—of lakhiraj lands . . . The permanent land-tax shall be made exclusively of the said articles now recited."—Madras Regulation XXV. § iv.

1817. "Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer."—Müll, H. of Br. India, v. 417.

1863. "The next head was 'Sayer,' an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.' It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined . . . to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head in the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under 'Sayer,' have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and what remains has been denominated 'Forest Revenue.'"—Sir C. Trevelyan, Financial Statement, dd. 30th April.

Under 1714 we find again, at Fort St. George:

"Joseph Smart, Rentall General and Scavenger, 8th of Council."

and so on, in the entries of most years down to 1761, when we have, for the last time:

"Samuel Ardley, 7th of Council, Masulipatam, Land-Customer, Military Storekeeper, Rentall General, and Scavenger."

Some light is thrown upon this surprising occurrence of such a term by a reference to Cowel's Law Dictionary, or The Interpreter (published originally in 1607) new ed. of 1727, where we read:

"Scrbage, Scavagium. It is otherwise called Schevage, Shewage, and Scheawwing; maybe deduced from the Saxon Seawian (Sceawian?) Ostendere, and is a kind of Toll or Custom exacted by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c., of Merchant-strangers, for Wares shewed or offered to Sale within their Precincts, which is prohibited by the Statute 19 H. 7, 8. In a Charter of Henry the Second to the City of Canterbury it is written Scewinga, and (in Mon. Ang. 2, per fol. 890 b.) Scawwing; and elsewhere I find it in Latin Tributum Ostensorum. The City of London still retains the Custom, of which in An old printed Book of the Customs of London, we read thus, Of which Custom halfen del appertaineth to the Sheriffs, and the other halfen del to the Hostys in whose Houses the Merchants been lodged: And it is to wet that Scavage is the Shew by cause that Merchanties (sic) shewn unto the Sheriffs Merchandizes, of the which Customs ought to be taken ere that any thing thereof be sold, &c.

"Scabngr, From the Belgick Scavan, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned 14 Car. 2, cap. 2. The Germans call him a Drecksimon, from one Simon, a noted Scavenger of Marburg.

"Schabadus, The officer who collected the Scavage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. i. p. 75; "Anno 1311. Schavaldos insurgentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter composuit. Aliqui suspendebantur, aliqui extra Episcopatum fugabantur.")

In Spelman also (Glossarium Archæologicum, 1688) we find :—

"Scavagium.] Tributum quod a mercatoribus exigere solent nundinarum domini, ob licentiam proponendi ibidem venditioni mercimoniam, a Saxon (scaavian) id est, Ostendere, inspicere, Angl. schtwagt and shrwagt." Spelman has no Scavenger or Scavager.

The scavage then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being as Skeat points out a Law French (or Low Latin ?) formation from shew. And the scavager or scavenger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Liber Albus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 34) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Scavage, i.e., inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word 'scavenger,' whose office corresponds with the rakyer (raker) of former times."

We can hardly doubt then, that the office of the Coromandel scavenger of the last century, united as we find it with that of "Rentall General," or of "Land-Customer," and held by a senior member of the Company's Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.) than customs on imports from seaward.

It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavengers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become a predominant part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavager's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albus. In Skinner's Etymologicon, 1671, the definition is Collector sordium abrasarum (erroneously connecting the word with shaving or scraping), whilst he adds: "nostri Scabengers vilissimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis auferendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scabinger. Boueur, Gadouard" — agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Lye's Junius, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connexion with the City of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavage was still alive within the City in 1829.

1829. "The oversight of customable goods. This office, termed in Latin supervisus, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles I. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day. . . . The real nature of this duty is not a toll for showing, but a toll paid for the oversight of showing; and under that name (supervisus apertionis) it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. . . . The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandize on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no concealment, or fraudulent practices . . . should deprive the King of his just dues. . . . (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III., and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty."—*G. Scymitar, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word is talwār (see Tulwaur). We get it through French cimiterre, Ital. scimetarra, and according to Marcel Devic originally from Pers. shamslūr (chinchār as he writes it). This would be still very obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between c and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. carquois from Pers. tirkash. Scimecirra representing shimsūr might easily thus become scimetirra. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. See also in Suppt.

Sebundy, s. Hind. from Pers. sih-bandī (sih = 'Three'). The rationale of the word is obscure to us. It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to "The Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners" employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E. I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the present Field Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840.*

* An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:—

"Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement of Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour.

"He commenced the work, obtained some (Native) officers and N. C. officers from the old Bengal Sappers, and enlisted about half of each company.

c. 1778. "At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowe. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company's military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundes, or native militia."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindsays, iii. 161.

1785. "The Board were pleased to direct that in order to supply the place of the Sebundy corps, four regiments of Sepoys be employed in securing the collection of the revenues."—In Seton-Karr, i. 92.

"One considerable charge upon unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Coolies, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick; and in 1888 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Nyalcollee—to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of pitaras as my sole possession.

"Just then, our relations with Nepal became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills unconnected with Nepal—Garrows and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me.

"When they arrived I found, instead of the 'fair recruits' announced, a number of most unfit men; some of them more or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in India as uddlee buddlee, the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them; but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly-opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitied my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!

"In the expressive words of my sergeant, there was not a 'visage' of the men left.

"The Sebundes were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was 6 rs. a month, instead of the Sepoy's 7½. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those they enlisted for.

"I eventually completed the corps with Nepalese, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

"I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N. C. officers from India with a good pea-jacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

"When I visited Darjeeling again in 1872, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome.

"My month's acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels or temporary huts thrown up by my Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical teaching to the Hill-men, the Hills, and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work."

Seedy, s. Hind. sīdī; Arab. saīyid, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), saīyidi, 'my lord;' and Mahr. siddhi. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahomedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan. Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz., the Nawāb of Jangīra, near Bombay (see Jungeera). The young heir to this principality, Siddhī Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the government in Oct., 1883.

But the popular application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general.

Seemul, Simmul, &c. (sometimes we have seen even Symbol, and Cymbal), s. Hind. semal and sembhal. The (so-called) cotton-tree, Bombax Malabaricum, D. C. (N. O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. "About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-buds are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine" (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishnagarh, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

Seer, s. Hind. ser; Skt. seṭak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and ser we often find in the same locality a pakkū and a kachchhū ser (see Pucka and Cutchā); a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only. See remarks under Pucka.

The ser is generally (at least in Upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas's ed. of Prinsep) is that called "Coolpahar," equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz.  $6\frac{1}{2}$  dr. avoird. ; the lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Mahratta country, which is little more than 8 oz.

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled "A Reg. for altering the weight of the new Furruckabad Rupee (see Rupee) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company's sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India." This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: "It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India." And Section IV. contains the following:

"The Tola or sicca weight to be equal to 180 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Rutties = 1 Masha = 15 troy grains.

12 Mashas = 1 Tola = 180 ditto.

80 Tolas (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer =  $2\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. troy.

40 Seers = 1 Mun or Bazar Maund = 100 lbs. troy."

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:—

"The system of weights and measures (?) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Saugor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for government or public purposes sent thither for examination."

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India; though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The seer of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy— $2\frac{1}{2}$  lbs. troy, 2,057 lbs. avoirdupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called "The Indian Weights and Measures Act" (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expedient to provide for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these. Section II. runs:

"Standards.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives."

Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called "The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act," repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fell to the ground.

The ser of these Acts would be = 2.2 lbs. avoirdupois, or 0.143 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

Seer-fish, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cybbium. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-fish (q.v.).

The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of stah (qu. Pers. 'black?') but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. serra. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Pristis)—see Buteau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of finlets, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day's Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates lv., lvi.).

1727. "They have great Plenty of Seer-fish, which is as Savoury as any Salmon or Trout in Europe."—A. Ham, i. 379.

1860. "Of those in ordinary use for the table the finest by far is the Seir-fish,† a species of Scomber, which is called Toramalu by the natives. It is in size and form very similar to the salmon, to which the flesh of the female fish, notwithstanding its white colour, bears a very close resemblance, both in firmness and flavour."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 205.

Seerpaw, s. Pers. through Hind. sar-o-pā—'cap-a-pie.' A complete suit, presented as a Khilat or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative (see Killut).

c. 1666. "He . . . commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroidered Vest, a Turbant, and a Girdle of Silk Embroidery, which is that which they call Ser-apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot."—Bernier, E. T., 37.

1673. "Sir George Oxendine . . . had a Collat (see Killut) or Seerpaw, a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1715. "Wewere met by Padre Stephanus, bringing two Seerpaws."—In Wheeler, ii. 245.

1727. "As soon as he came, the King embraced him, and ordered a serpow or a royal Suit to be put upon him."—A. Ham, i. 171.

1735. "The last Nabob (Sadatulla) would very seldom suffer any but himself to send a Seerpaw; whereas in February last Sunta Sahib, Subder Ali Sahib, Jehare Khan and Inaam Sahib, had all of them taken upon them to send distinct Seerpaws to the President."—In Wheeler, iii. 140.

1759. "Another deputation carried six costly Seerpaws; these are garments which are presented sometimes by superiors in token of protection, and sometimes by inferiors in token of homage."—Orme, i. 159.

Seetulputty, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used often to sleep on in the hot weather. H. stalpattī, 'cold-slip.' Williamson's spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see Sikligur) are quite erroneous.

1810. "A very beautiful species of mat is made . . . especially in the south-eastern districts . . . from a kind of reedy grass . . . These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated 'seekul-putty' (i.e. polished sheets) . . . The principal uses of the 'seekul-putty' are, to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, thereby to keep the body cool."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 41.

In Fallon's Dicty. we find the following Hindi riddle:—

"Chini kã piyālã tūtã, koĩ jortã nahĩn;
Mũlĩ jĩ kã bāg lagã, koĩ tortã nahĩn;
Sital-pũlĩ bichhĩ, koĩ sotã nahĩn;
Rāj-bansĩ mũã, koĩ rotã nahĩn."

Which might be thus rendered:

"A china bowl that, broken, none can join;
A flowery field, whose blossoms none purloin;
A royal scion slain, and none shall weep;
A sitalpattī spread where none shall sleep."

The answer is an Egg; the Starry Sky; a Snake (Rāj-bansĩ, 'royal scion,' is a placatory name for a snake); and the Sea.

Semball, s. Malay-Javan. Sāmbūl, sāmbul. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago.

1817. "The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the lombok (i.e. red-pepper); triturated with salt it is called sambel."—Raffles, Java, i. 98.

Sepoy, Seapoy, s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. sipāhī, from sipāh, 'soldiery, an army;' which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spāda, 'a soldier' (Le Peuple et la Langue des Mèdes, 1879, p. 24). But Sbah is a horseman in Armenian; and sound etymologists connect sipāh with asp, 'a horse.'

* Corvina is applied by Cuvier, Cantor and others to fish of the genus Sciaena of more recent ichthyologists.

† "Cybiium (Scomber, Linn.) gutlatum."—Tennent.

The word *sepo*y occurs in S. India before we had troops in Bengal; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese use. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David's is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS.

The original word sipāhī occurs frequently in the poems of Amīr Khusrū (c. A.D. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a 'horse-soldier,' for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See spāhī below.

c. 1300. "Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few sipāhīs from Hindustan, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority."—Amīr Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 536.

1737. "Elle com tota a força desponivel, que eram 1156 soldados pagos em que entraram 281 chegados na não Mercês, e 780 sympaes ou lascarins, recuperon o territorio."—Bosquejo das Possessões Portuguezas no Oriente, &c., por Joaquim Pedro Celestino Soares, Lisboa, 1851, p. 58.

1746. "The Enemy, by the best Intelligence that could be got, and best Judgment that could be formed, had or would have on Shore next Morning, upwards of 3000 Europeans, with at least 500 Coffrys, and a number of Cephoys and Peons."—Ext. of Diary, &c., in App. to A Letter to a Propr. of the E. I. Co., London, 1750, p. 94.

1747. "At a Council of War held at Fort St. David the 25th December, 1747.

1763. "The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Sepoys."—Orme, i. 80.

1770. "England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 9800 European troops, and 54,000 sipahis well armed and disciplined."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 459.

1774. "Sipai sono li soldati Indiani."—Della Tomba, 297.

1780. "Next morning the *sepo*y came to see me . . . I told him that I owed him my life . . . He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Imprisonment, Lives of Lindsays, iii. 274.

1782. "As to Europeans who run from their national colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard one of the best officers the Company ever had . . . say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Seapoys; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 95-96.

The French write cipaye or cipai :

1759. "De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cens sur la route de Pondichery, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Coulis, ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry in Cambridge's Account, p. 150.

"Il ne craint ni Kriss ni zagaies,
Il regarde l'homme sans fuir,
Et rit des balles des cipayes
Qui rebondissent sur son cuir."

Th. Gautier, L'Hippopotame.

Since the conquest of Algeria the same word is common in France under another form, viz., spâhî. But the Spâhî is a totally different being from the sepo, and is in fact an irregular horseman. With the Turks, from whom the word is taken, the spâhî was always a horseman.

1554. "Aderant magnis muneribus praepositi multi, aderant praetoriani equites omnes Sphai, Garipigi, Ulufagi, Gianzarorum magnus numerus, sed nullus in tanto conventu nobilis nisi ex suis virtutibus et fortibus factis."—Busbey, Epistolae, i. 99.

1672. "Mille ou quinze cents spahis, tous bien équipés et bien montés . . . terminoient toute ceste longue, magnifique, et pompeuse cavalcade."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, i. 142.

1675. "The other officers are the sardan, who commands the Janizaries . . . the Spahi Aga, who commands the Spahies or Turkish Horse."—Wheeler's Journal, 348.

1786. "Bajazet had two years to collect his forces . . . we may discriminate the janizaries . . . a national cavalry, the Spahis of modern times."—Gibbon, ch. lxxv.

1877. "The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. . . . The spahis acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry which the janissaries held among the infantry, and their seditious conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Greece, ed. 1877, v. 37.

Serai, Serye, s. This word is used to represent two oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sarā, sarāi. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Tartars when they began to build palaces. Hence Sarāi, the name of more than one royal residence of the Mongol Khans upon the Volga, the Sarai of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language sarai has been degraded to mean 'a shed.'

The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, serail and serraglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the "striving after meaning" connected the word with Ital. serrato, 'shut up'; and with a word serraglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connexion. It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's closed apartments' to the word. Sarai has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Serraglio di Belve. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of 'a Seraggle of blackguards.'

1609. ". . . by it the great Suray, besides which are diuers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein diuers neate lodgings are to be let, with doores, lockes, and keys to each."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614. "This term serraglio, so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk's dwelling . . . has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly 'a palace' . . . But since this word serai resembles serrai, as a Venetian would call it, or serraglio as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (serrato or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the women and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barred up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into serraglio."—P. della Valle, i. 36.

1615. "Onely from one dayes Journey to another the Sophie hath caused to bee erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodgings (like hamlets) called caravan-sara, or surroyes, for the benefite of Caravanes. . . ."—De Montfaut, 8.

1616. "In this kingdom there are no Innes to entertaine strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their receit, which they call Sarray, not inhabited, where any Passenger may have roome freely, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessities."—Terry in Purchas, ii. 1475.

1638. "Which being done we departed from our Serray (or Inne)."—W. Bruton, Hakl. v. 49.

1648. "A great sary or place for housing travelling folk."—Van Twist, 17.

1782. "The stationary tenants of the Serauee, many of them women, and some of them very pretty, approach the traveller on his entrance, and in alluring language describe to him the varied excellencies of their several lodgings."—Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, i. 86.

1808. "We had some bread and butter, two surahees of water, and a bottle of brandy."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

1825. "The whole number of lodgers in and about the serai, probably did not fall short of 500 persons. What an admirable scene for Eastern romance would such an inn as this afford!"—Heber, ii. 122 (ed. 1844).

1850. "He will find that, if we omit only three names in the long line of the Delhi Emperors, the comfort and happiness of the people were never contemplated by them; and with the exception of a few sarais and bridges,—and these only on roads traversed by the imperial camps—he will see nothing in which purely selfish considerations did not prevail."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Original Preface to Historians of India (Elliot, I., xxiii).

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goglet (q.v.) This is Arabo-Pers. ṣurāḥī.

c. 1666. "... my Navab having vouchsafed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new loaf of his house, and a Souray of the water of Ganges . . . Souray is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the Servant that marcheth on foot before the Gentleman on horseback, carrieth in his hand, wrapt up in a sleeve of red cloth."—Bernier, E. T., 114.

Serang. s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. sarhang, 'a commander or overseer.' In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wills, 80).

1599. "... there set sail two Portuguese vessels which were come to Amacoe from the City of Goa, as occurs every year. They are commanded by Captains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of these nations, whom they understand, and recognise and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi."—Carletti, Viaggi, ii. 206.

1690. "Indus quem de hoc Ludo consului fuit scriba satis peritus ab officio in nave sua dictus le sarang, Anglice Boatswain sed Boson."—Hyde, De Ludis Orient. in Syntagma, ii. 264.

Seringapatam, n. p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tippoo. Written Sri-ranga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnu's Town.' But as both this and the other Srirangam (Seringam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Cauvery, it is possible that ranga stands for Lanka, and that the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

Sett, s. Properly (Hind.) Seth; which according to Wilson is the same word with the Chetti or Shetti of the Malabar Coast (see Chetty), the different forms being all from the Skt. śreṣṭha, 'best, or chief,' śreṣṭhi, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti with the Skt. word (see Chetty).

1740. "The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund (&c.), they being of a different caste; and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757. "To the Seats Mootabray and Roopchund the Government of Chandunagore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 138 of reprint (Bk. viii.).

1770. "As soon as an European arrived the Gentoos, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character . . . and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at this, is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks."

"These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. . . ."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 427.

Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setts.

Settlement, s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when, instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and inquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province.

Seven Sisters (or Brothers). The popular name (in Hind. sāt bhain) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terricolor, Hodgson, 'Bengal babbler' of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon's Birds (Godwin-Austen's edition, ii. 59).

1878. "The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas . . . . sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly talking whilst they, hop."—In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883. ". . . the Satbhai or 'Seven Brothers' . . . are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of . . . . Among themselves they will quarrel by the hour, and bandy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once . . . . Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth's opinionative child, they are seven."—Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

In China certain birds of starling kind are called by the Chinese pa-ko, or "Eight Brothers," for a like reason. See Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 1868, p. 319.

Severndroog, n. p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz. :

a. Swarnadruga, or Suwandrug, on the west coast about 78 m. below Bombay (Lat. 17° 48' N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Tulaji Angria, of the famous piratical family.

b. Savandrug; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis's army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 55').

Seychelle Islands, n. p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40' & 4° 50' S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise "in the centre of a vast plateau of coral" of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Irmãos or Hermanos) sometimes Seven Sisters (Sete Irmãs), whilst in Delisle's Map of Asia (1700) we have both "les Sept Frères" and "les Sept Soeurs." Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Almirantes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained uninhabited, and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of last century. In 1742 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the islands of this little Archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazare Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1744, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé, and to the group the name of, Iles de Bourdonnais, for which Iles Mahé (which is the name given in the Neptune Orientale of D'Après de Manneville, 1775),* seems to have been substituted. Whatever may have been La Bourdonnais' plans with respect to these islands, they were interrupted by his engagement in the Indian campaigns of 1745-46, and his government of Mauritius was never resumed. In * See pp. 29-38, and the charts.

1756 the Sieur Morphey (Murphy?), commander of the frigate Le Cerf, was sent by M. Magon, Governor of Mauritius and Bourbon, to take possession of the Island of Mahé. But it seems doubtful if any actual settlement of the islands by the French occurred till after 1769.

A question naturally has suggested itself to us as to how the group came by the name of Seychelles Islands; and it is one to which no trustworthy answer will be easily found in English, if at all. Even French works of pretension (e.g. the Dictionnaire de La Rousse) are found to state that the islands were named after the "Minister of Marine, Hérault de Séchelles, who was eminent for his services and his able administration. He was the first to establish a French settlement there." This is quoted from La Rousse; but the fact is that the only man of the name known to fame is the Jacobin and friend of Danton, along with whom he perished by the guillotine. There never was a Minister of Marine so-called! The name Séchelles first (so far as we can learn) appears in the Hydrographie Française of Belin, 1767, where in a map entitled Carte réduite du Canal de Mozambique the islands are given as Les îles Sécheyles, with two enlarged plans en cartouche of the Port de Sécheyles. In 1767 also the Chev. de Grenier commanding the Heure du Berger, visited the Islands, and in his narrative states that he had with him the chart of Picault, "envoyé par La Bourdonnais pour reconnoître les îles des Sept Frères, lesquelles ont été depuis nommée îles Mahé et ensuite îles Séchelles." We have not been able to learn by whom the latter name was given, but it was probably by Morphey of the Cerf; for among Dalrymple's Charts (pub. 1771), there is a "Plan of the Harbour adjacent to Bat River on the Island Seychelles, from a French Plan made in 1756, published by Bellin." And there can be no doubt that the name was bestowed in honour of Moreau de Séchelles, who was Contrôleur-Général des Finances in France in 1754-1756, i.e., at the very time when Governor Magon sent Capt. Morphey to take possession. One of the islands again is called Silhouette, the name of an official who had been Commissaire du roi près la Compagnie des Indes, and succeeded Moreau de Séchelles as Controller of Finance; and another is called Praslin, apparently after the Duc de Choiseul Praslin who was Minister of Marine from 1766 to 1770.

The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Captain Neale shews that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahé as "the island Seychelles, or Sécheyles," as in Belin's chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which La Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connexion with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1794, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L'Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526.)

c. 1610. "Le Roy (des Maldives) enuoya par deux foys vn très expert pilote pour aller decouvrir vne certaine île nommée pollouys, qui leur est presque inconnue . . . Ils disent aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l'isle elle est fertile en toutes sortes de fruicts, et mesme ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocos medicinaux qui sont si chers-là en viennent . . . Elle est sous la hauteur de dix degrés au delà de la ligne et enuiron six vingt lieues des Maldives . . ." (see Coco-de-Mer).—Pyrrard de Larval, i. 212.

1769. "The principal places, the situation of which I determined, are the Sécheyles islands, the flat of Cargados, the Salha da Maha, the island of Diego Garcia, and the Adu isles. The island Sécheyles has an exceedingly good harbour . . . This island is covered with wood to the very summit of the mountains . . . In 1769 when I spent a month here in order to determine its position with the utmost exactness, Sécheyles and the adjacent isles were inhabited only by monstrous crocodiles; but a small establishment has since been formed on it for the cultivation of cloves and nutmegs."—Voyage to Madagascar and the E. Indies by the Abbé Rochon, E. T., London, 1792, p. liii.

1772. "The island named Seychelles is inhabited by the French, and has a good harbour. . . . I shall here deliver my opinion that these islands, where we now are, are the Three Brothers and the adjacent islands . . . as there are no islands to the eastward of them in these latitudes, and many to the westward."—Capt. Neale's Passage from Bencoolen to the Seychelles Islands in the Swift Grab. In Dunn's Directory, ed. 1780, pp. 225, 232.

Sha, Sah, s. A merchant or banker; often now attached as a surname. It is Hind. sāh and sāhu from Skt. sādhu, 'perfect, virtuous, respectable' ('prud-homme'). See Soucar.

Shabash! interj. 'Well done!' 'Bravo!' Pers. Shāh-bāsh. 'Rex fias!'

c. 1610. "Le Roy fit rencontre de moy . . . me disant vn mot qui est commun en toute l'Inde, à savoir Sabatz, qui veut dire grand mercy, et sert aussi à louer vn homme pour quelque chose qu'il a bien fait."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 224.

Shabunder, s. Pers. Shāh-bandar, lit. 'King of the Haven,' Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabander; ours Shabunder or Sabundar. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo. In the marine Malay States the Shābandar was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports. At Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, 'Scheik Bandar' (Voyages, iii. 121).

c. 1539. "This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a Letter and a Present from the Captain of Malacca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabandar, who is he that with absolute Power governs all the affairs of the Army."—Punto (orig. cap. xv.) in Cogan's Transl., p. 18.

1552. "And he who most insisted on this was a Moor, Xabandar of the Guza-rates" (at Malacca).—Castanheda, ii. 359.

1553. "A Moorish lord called Sabayō . . . as soon as he knew that our ships belonged to the people of these parts of Christendom, desiring to have confirmation on the matter, sent for a certain Polish Jew who was in his service as Shabandar (Xabandar), and asked him if he knew of what nation were the people who came in these ships . . ."—Barros, i. iv. 11.

1561. ". . . a boatman, who, however, called himself Xabandar."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 80.

1599. "The Sabandar tooke off my Hat, and put a Roll of white linnen about my head. . . ."—J. Davis, in Purchas, i. 12.

1606. "Then came the Sabendor with light, and brought the Generall to his house."—Middleton's Voyage, E. (4).

1610. "The Sabander and the Governor of Mancock (a place scituated by the River) . . ."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 322.

c. 1650. "Coming to Golconda, I found that the person whom I had left in trust with my chamber was dead: but that which I observ'd most remarkable, was, that I found the door seal'd with two Seals, one being the Cadi's or chief Justice's, the other the Sha-Bander's, or Provost of the Merchants."—Tavernier, E. T., Pt. II., 136.

1673. "The Shawbunder has his Grandeur too, as well as receipt of Custon, for which he pays the King yearly 22,000 Thomands."—Fryer, 222.

1688. "When we arrived at Achin, I was carried before the Shabander, the chief Magistrate of the City . . ."—Dampier, i. 502.

1711. "The Duties the Honourable Company require to be paid here on Goods are not above one fifth Part of what is paid to the Shabander or Custom-Master."—Lockyer, 223.

1726. Valentyn, v. 313, gives a list of the Sjahbandars of Malakka from 1641 to 1725. They are names of Dutchmen.

1759. "I have received a long letter from the Shahzada, in which he complains that you have begun to carry on a large trade in salt, and betel nut, and refuse to pay the duties on those articles . . . which practice, if continued, will oblige him to throw up his post of Shahbunder Droga."—W. Hastings to the Chief at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 5.

1795. "The descendant of a Portuguese, family, named Jaunsee, whose origin was very low, . . . was invested with the important office of Shawbunder, or intendant of the port, and receiver of the port customs."—Symes, p. 160.

1837. "The Seyd Mohammad El Mah-roockee, the Shahbendar (chief of the Merchants of Cairo) hearing of this event, suborned a common fellah . . ."—Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1837, i. 157.

Shaddock, s. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the Pommelo, q.v. And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India.

"Nor let thy bright impatient flames destroy

The golden Shaddock, the forbidden fruit . . ."—Grainger, Bk. I.

1878. ". . . the splendid Shaddock that, weary of ripening, lays itself upon the ground and swells at ease . . ."—In My Indian Garden, 50.

Shade (Table-shade, Wall-shade),

s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of this century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within it. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade.

In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of this century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret.

The second quotation below gives a notable description of a captain's outfit when taking the field in last century :

1780. "Borrowed last Month by a Person or Persons unknown, out of a private Gentleman's House near the Esplanade, a very elegant Pair of Candle Shades. Whoever will return the same will receive a reward of 40 Sicca Rupees.—N.B. The Shades have private marks."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 8th.

1789. "His tent is furnished with a good large bed, mattress, pillow, &c., a few camp-stools or chairs, a folding table, a pair of shades for his candles, six or seven trunks with table equipage, his stock of linen (at least 24 shirts); some dozens of wine, brandy, and gin; tea, sugar, and biscuit; and a hamper of live poultry and his milch-goat."—Munro's Narrative, 186.

1817. "I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 511.

Shagreen, s. This English word, —French chagrin; Ital. zigrino; Mid. High Ger. Zager, —comes from the Pers. saghrī, Turk. şāghrī, meaning properly the croupe or quarter of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called saghrī in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chagrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Italian lima also is (Etym. Worterbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation.

1663. ". . . à Alep . . . on y travaille aussi bien qu'à Damas le sagri, qui est ce qu'on appelle chagrin en France, mais l'on en fait une bien plus grande quantité en Perse. . . . Le sagri se fait de croupe d'âne," etc.—Thevenot, Voyages, iii. 115-116.

1862. "Saghrée, or Keemookht, Horse or Ass-Hide."—Punjab Trade Report, App. ccxx.

Shaitan. Ar. The Evil One; Satan. Shaitān ka bhāi, 'Brother of the Arch-Enemy,' was a title given to Sir Charles Napier by the Amīrs of Sind and their followers. He was not the first great English soldier to whom this title had been applied in the East. In the romance of Coeur de Lion, when Richard entertains a deputation of Saracens by serving at table the head of one of their brethren, we are told :

"Every man sat styll and pokyd othir;
They saide: 'This is the Develys brothir,
That sles our men, and thus hem etes . . ."

1863. "Not many years ago, an eccentric gentleman wrote from Sikkim to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta, stating that, on the snows of the mountains there, were found certain mysterious footsteps, more than 30 or 40 paces asunder, which the natives alleged to be Shaitan's. The writer at the same time offered, if Government would give him leave of absence for a certain period, etc., to go and trace the author of these mysterious vestiges, and thus this strange creature would be discovered without any expense to Government. The notion of catching Shaitan without any expense to Government was a sublime piece of Anglo-Indian tact, but the offer was not accepted."—Notes to Friar Jordanus, 37.

Shalee, Shaloo, Shella, Sallo, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the two latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the first two (Shakespeare and Fallon give sālū) are names in familiar use for a soft twilled cotton stuff, of a Turkey-red colour, somewhat resembling what we call, by what we had judged to be a modification of the word, shaloon.

But we find that Skeat and other authorities ascribe the latter word to a corruption of Chalons, which gave its name to certain stuffs, apparently bed-coverlets of some sort. Thus in Chaucer:

"With shetes and with chalons faire yspredde."—The Reeve's Tale.

On which Tyrwhitt quotes from the Monasticon, "... aut pannos pictos qui vocantur chalons loco lectisternii." See also in Liber Albus:

"La charge de chalouns et draps de Reynes . . ."—p. 225.
Also at p. 231.

c. 1343. "I went then to Shāliyāt (near Calicut—see Chale), a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs (qu. shāli?) that bear its name."—Ibn Bat. iv. 109.

c. 1750–60. "... a large investment of piece-goods, especially of the coarse ones, Byrampauts, chelloes and others, for the Guinea market."—Grose, i. 99.

1813. "Red Shellas or Salloes. . ."—Milburne, i. 124.

In the following the word seems used by mistake for saree, q.v.:

1809. "The shalie, a long piece of coloured silk or cotton, is wrapped round the waist in the form of a petticoat, which leaves part of one leg bare, whilst the other is covered to the ankle with long and graceful folds, gathered up in front, so as to leave one end of the shalie to cross the breast, and form a drapery, which is sometimes thrown over the head as a veil."—Maria Graham, 3.

Shama, s. H. shāmā. A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, Kitta cincla

macrura, Gmel. "In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy." (Jerdon).

The long tail seems to indicate the identity of this bird rather than the maina (see Myna) with that described by Aelian.

c. A.D. 250. "There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a starling. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more loquacious and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for intercourse with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts . . . call the bird κερκίαι ('Taily'); and the name arose from the fact that the bird twitches his tail just like a wagtail."—Aelian de Nat. Anim. xvi. 3.

Shaman, Shamanism, s. These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself with exorcism and "devil-dancing" as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddahs of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. "Hinduism has assimilated these prior superstitions of the sons of Tur," as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Mussulman orthodoxy" (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. ii., ch. 50).

The characteristic of Shamanism is the existence of certain soothsayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dancings.

The immediate origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjurer in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming saman, pl. samasa. But then in Chinese Sha-mán or Shi-mán is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. sramana, Pali samana. Whether the Tunguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately,* finds it difficult to suppose any connexion. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

c. B.C. 320. "Τὸς δὲ Σαρμάνας, τοὺς μὲν ἐντομωτάτους Ὑλοβίους φησὶν ὀνομάζεσθαι, ζῶντας ἐν ταῖς ὕλαις ἀπὸ φύλλων καὶ καρπῶν ἀγρίων, ἐσθίοντας δ' ἔχειν ἀπὸ φλοίων δενδρέων, ἀπροδισίων χωρὶς καὶ οἴνου."—From Megasthenes, in Strabo, xv.

c. 712. "All the Samanís assembled and sent a message to Bajhrá, saying, "We are ndsik devotees. Our religion is one of peace and quiet, and fighting and slaying is prohibited, as well as all kinds of shedding of blood."—Chach Nama, in Elliot, i. 158.

1829. "Kami is the Mongol name of the spirit-conjurer or sorcerer, who before the introduction of Buddhism exercised among the Mongols the office of Sacrificer and Priest, as he still does among the Tunguzes, Manjus, and other Asiatic tribes. . . . In Europe they are known by the Tunguz name schaman; among the Manjus as saman, and among the Tibetans as Hlaba. The Mongols now call them with contempt and abhorrence Böh or Böghe, i.e. 'Sorcerer,' 'Wizard,' and the women who give themselves to the like fooleries Udugun."—I. J. Schmidt, Notes to Sanang Setzen, p. 416.

1871. "Among Siberian tribes, the shamans select children liable to convulsions as suitable to be brought up to the profession, which is apt to become hereditary with the epileptic tendencies it belongs to."—Tylor, Primitive Culture, ii. 121.

Shambogue, s. Canar. shāna- or sāna-bhōga. A village clerk or accountant.

1801. "When the whole Kist is collected, the shambogue and potail carry it to the teshildar's cutcherry."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 316.

Shameeana, Semianna, s. Pers. shamiyāna or shāmiyāna, an awning or flat tent-roof without sides; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populo, and in a manner generally accessible.

c. 1590. "The Shāmyānah-awning is made of various sizes, but never more than of 12 yards square."—Āin, 54.

1616. "... there is erected a throne four feet from the ground in the Durbar Court from the back whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 43 broad was rayled in, and covered with fair Semiaenes or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet joyned together, and sustained with Canes so covered."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i.

1814. "I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summiniana, or Shamyana, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 455.

1857. "At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives 'Shameanahs.'"—Mark Thornhill, Personal Adventures, &c. in the Mutiny, 1854, p. 14.

Shampoo, v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigue, &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is chāmpnā, from the imperative of which, chāmpo, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of bunow, puckerow, &c.

The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly gripe and smite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the blood. It is a pleasing wantonnesse, and much valued in these hot climes." In Purchas, ii. 1475.

The process was familiar to the Romans under the empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractator and tractatrix. But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748. "Shampooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampooed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments. . . ." (The account is good, but too long for extract.)—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1762, p. 226.

* Über den Doppelsinn des Wortes Schamane und über den tungusischen Schamanen-Cultus am Hofe der Mandju Kaisern. Berlin Akad., 1842.

1750-60. "The practice of champing, which by the best intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularizing, as it is little known to the modern Europeans . . ."—Grose, i. 113.

This writer quotes Martial, iii. Ep. 82, and Seneca, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1800. "The Sultan generally rose at break of day: after being champoeed, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Beatson, War with Tippoo, p. 159.

c. 1810. "Then whilst they fanned the children, or champoeed them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1001 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog., 410.

. 1810. "That considerable relief is obtained from shampooing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue . . ."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 198.

1813. "There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, champoings, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensualists."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i., 35. *

Shan, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great T'ai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Loubère, who is very accurate) T'ai-Noe or 'Little T'ai,' whilst they applied the term T'ai-Yai, or 'Great T'ai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these; * sometimes also calling the latter T'ai-güt, or the 'T'ai left behind.' The T'ai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan states exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Camboja; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the case of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilization, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable states.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Aham, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirate and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan state, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Man, and in Burma by the Buddhistic-classical name of Kau-sāmbi (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-pyi and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan-States.' Further south were those T'ai states which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller states of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north to Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Mau or Kau-sāmbi), the Shan (Proper), or Burmese Shan, Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shān, is written rhām. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Symes in 1795. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not till the Burmese war of 1824-26, and the active investigation of our eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shans that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. Ney Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Introd. Sketch of the Hist. of the Shans, &c.).

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Kakhyens; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Siēm (written Steyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Sieyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Sien, which the Chinese used in the compound Sien-lo (for Siam,—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. III. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shans as Yudia (see Judea) Shans, a term perhaps sometimes including Siam itself.

Symes gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as 'Yoodra-Shaan,' and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people 'Cassay Shaan' (see Cassay).

1795. "These events did not deter Shanbuan from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Munni-poor and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition."—Symes, p. 77.

"Zemee (see Jangomay), Sanda-poor, and many districts of the Yoodra Shaan to the eastward, were tributary, and governed by Chobwas, who annually paid homage to the Birman king."—Id., 102.

"Shaan, or Shan, is a very comprehensive term given to different nations, some independent, others the subjects of the greater states."—Id. p. 274.

c.1818. "... They were assisted by many of the Zaboa (see Chobwa in Suppt.) or petty princes of the Sciam, subject to the Burmese, who, wearied by the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. . . . The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous. . . . instead of overcoming the Sciam (they) only lost day by day the territories. . . . and saw their princes range themselves. . . . under the protection of the King of Siam."—Sangermano, p. 57.

Shanbaff, Sinabaff, &c., s. Pers. shānbāft. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps, indeed, these names indicate two different stuffs, but we do not know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinabaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabāff is not in Vullers's Lexicon. Shānabāf is; and is explained as genus panni grossioris, sic descripta, (E.T.):

"A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of kabās (see Cabaya) for sale."—Bahār-i-'Ajām.

But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China.

1343. "When the aforesaid present came to the Sultan of India (from the Emp. of China) . . . in return for this present he sent another of greater value. . . . 100 pieces of shirīnbāf, and 500 pieces of shānbāf."—Ibn Bat., iv. 3.

1498. "The overseer of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call beyramies, and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos . . ."—Correa, E.T. by Ld. Stanley, 197.

1510. "One of the Persians said: 'Let us go to our house, that is, to Calicut.' I answered, 'Do not go, for you will lose these fine sinabaph' (which were pieces of cloth we carried)."—Varthema, 269.

1516. "The quintal of this sugar was worth two ducats and a half in Malabar, and a good Sinabāffo was worth two ducats."—Barbosa, 179.

Shaster, s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. śāstra, 'a rule,' a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612. "... They have many books in their Latin. . . . Six of these they call Xastra, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purina, which are the limbs."—Couto, V., vi. 3.

1630. "... The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shaster, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

1717. "The six Sastrangól contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship . . ."—Phillips's Acc. 40.

1765. ". . . at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1756, I lost many curious Gentoo manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Gentoo Shastah,"—J. Z. Holwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2d ed., 1766, i. 3.

1770. "The Shastah is looked upon by some as a commentary on the vedam, and by others as an original work."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 50.

1776. "The occupation of the Bramin should be to read the Beids, and other Shasters."—Halded, Gentoo Code, 39.

Shawl, s. Pers. and Hind. shāl, also doshāla, 'a pair of shawls.' The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. śavala, 'variegated.'

Sir George Birdwood tells us he has found among the old India records "Carmania shells" and "Carmania shawools," meaning apparently Kermān shawls. He gives no dates unfortunately.

In Meninski (published 1680) shāl is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally :

"Panni viliores qui partim albi, partim cineritii, partim nigri esse solent ex lana et pills caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telam injiciunt humeris Dervisii. . . . instar stolae aut pallii." To this he adds, "Datur etiam sericea ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostri multitii, sive simplicis sive duplicati." For this the 2d edition, a century later, substitutes: "Shāl-i-Hindī" (Indian shawl). "Tela sericea subtilissima ex India adferri solita."

c. 1590. "In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmir. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (shāl-bāfi) manufacture of shawls in Kashmir. In Lahór also there are more than 1000 workshops."—Ain, 92.

c. 1665. "Ils mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu'ils sortent, une Chal, qui est une maniere de toilette d'une laine très-fine qui se fait a Cachmir. Ces Chals ont environ deux aunes * de long sur une de large. On les achete vingt-cinq ou trente écus si elles sont fines. Il y en a même qui coûtent cinquante écus, mais ce sont les très-fines."—Thevenot, v. 110.

c. 1666. "Ces chales sont certaines pièces d'étoffe d'une aune * et demie de long, et d'une de large ou environ, qui sont brodées aux deux bouts d'une espèce de broderie, faite au métier, d'un pied ou environ de large . . . J'en ai vu de ceux que les Omrāhs font faire exprès, qui coutoient jusqu'à cent cinquante Roupies; des autres qui sont de cette laine du pays, je n'en ai pas vu qui passaient 50 Roupies."—Bernier, ii. 280-281.

1717. ". . . Con tutto ciò preziosissime nobilissime e senza comparazione magnifiche sono le tele che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustana, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra scendere le due metà, con queste si cinge . . ."—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

1727. "When they go abroad they wear a Shawl folded up, or a piece of White Cotton Cloth lying loose on the Top of their Heads."—A. Ham. ii. 50.

c. 1760. "Some Shawls are manufactured there . . . Those coming from the province of Cachemire on the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautifully bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so pliant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger."—Grose, i. 118.

1781. Sonnerat writes challes. He says: "Ces étoffes (faites avec la laine des moutons de Tibet) surpassent nos plus belles soieries en finesse."—Voyage, i. 52.

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that width; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

Sheeah, Shia, s. Arab. shī'a, i.e. 'sect.' A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahomedan 'sect,' or sects rather, which specially venerate 'Ali, and regard the Imāms, his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the 'Sophy' dynasty, q.v.) are Shī'as, and a good many of the Moslem in India.

The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Ismaelites of Musulman history, and the modern Bohras and "Mulāhis," may generally be regarded as Shī'a.

c. 1309. "... dont encore il est ainsi, que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali dient que cil qui croient en la loy Mahomet sont mescreant; et aussi tuit cil qui croient en la loy Mahonimet dient que tuit cil qui croient en la loy Haali sont mescreant."—Joinville, 252.

1553. "Among the Moors have always been controversies . . . which of those four first Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Bubac, Homar, and Otthoman, the Persians (Parseos) favoured Alle, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahamed . . . to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xiā, as much as to say 'Union of one Body,' and the Arabs call them in reproach Rafady,* as much as to say 'People astray from the Path,' whilst they call themselves Çuny, which is the contrary."—Barros, II. x. 6.

1620. "The Sonnite adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who actually possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Shias (Sciā), i.e., 'Sectaries,' and are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali alone."—P. della Valle, ii. 75.

1626. "He is by Religion a Mahumetan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turkes, are distinguished in their Sectes by tearmes of Seaw and Sunnee."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 995.

1673. "His Substitute here is a Chias Moor."—Fryer, 29.

1798. "In contradistinction to the Sonnis, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Schahs drop their arms in straight lines."—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805. "The word Sh'eeah, or Sheeut, properly signifies a troop or sect, . . . but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Ali, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khuleefah, or successor to Moochummad."—Baillie, Digest of Mah. Law, II. xii.

Sheermaul, s. Pers. Hind. shūrmāl, a cake made with flour, milk and leaven; a sort of brioche.

Sherbet, s. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat * (= 'a draught,') it is not a word now in Anglo-Indian use. The Arabic word seems to have entered Europe by several different doors. Thus in Italian and French we have sorbetto and sorbet, which probably came direct from the Levantine or Turkish form shurbat or shorbat; in Sp. and Port. we have xarabe, axarabe (ash-sharāb, the standard Ar. sharāb, 'wine or any beverage,') and xarope, and from these forms probably Ital. sciroppo, siroppo, with old French ysserop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and, more directly from the Spanish, shrub. Modern Span. again gets, by reflexion from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Dozy, 17, and Marcel Devic, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imported direct from the Levant. The form sharāb is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shraub, Sherry-shraub, Lall-shraub (q.v.), Brandy-shraub, Beer-shraub.

c. 1334. "... They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar candy-water; i.e., syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet" (ash-shurbat).—Ibn Bat. iii. 124.

1554. "... potio est gratissima praesertim ubi multa nive, quae Constantino-poli nullo tempore deficit, fuerit refrigerata, Arab Sorbet vocant, hoc est, potionem Arabicam."—Busbeg, Ep. i. (p. 92).

1578. "The physicians of the same country use this xarave (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers."—Acosta, 67.

1611. "In Persia there is much good wine of grapes which is called Xarāb in the language of the country."—Teixeira, i. 16.

c. 1630. "Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; 'tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and juyce of Lemons mixt, call'd Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 241.

1682. "The Moores . . . drank a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also drank a little sorbet, and jacolat."—Evelyn's Diary, 24th Jan.

1827. "On one occasion, before Barak-el-Hadgi left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound."—Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. x.

1837. "The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. . . . The most common kind (called simply shurbāt or shurbāt sook'kr . . .) is merely sugar and water . . . lemonade (ey'moñitch, or sharāb el-eymoñ) is another."—Lane, Modern Egyptians, ed. 1837, i. 206.

1863. "The Estate overseer usually gave a dance to the people, when the most dissolute of both sexes were sure to be present, and to indulge too freely in the shrub made for the occasion."—Waddell, 29 Years in the W. Indies, 17.

1498. "The ambassador was a white man who was Xarife, as much as to say a creligo (i.e. clerigo)."—Roteiro, 2d ed. 30.

Sheristadar, s. The head ministerial officer of a court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form, and duly stamped; and generally to attend to routine business. Properly Hind. Pers. from sar-rishṭā-dār or sarishta-dār, 'register-keeper.' Sar-rishṭā, an office of registry, literally means 'head of the string.' C. P. Brown interprets Sarrishtadar as 'he who holds the end of the string (on which puppets dance)'—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps 'keeper of the clue,' or 'of the file,' would approximately express the idea.

1786. (With the object of establishing) "the officers of the Canongoe's Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars . . . and to prevent confusion in the time to come. . . . For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Serrishtadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department."—Letter from G. G. in C. to Board of Revenue, 19th July (Bengal Rev. Regulation xix.).

1878. "Nowadays, however, the Serishtadar's signature is allowed to authenticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 117.

Shigram, s. A Bombay name for a kind of hack palanquin-carriage. The name is from Mahr. siḡhr (Skt. siḡhram), 'quick or quickly.'

Shikar, s. Hind. from Pers. shikār = 'la chasse'; sport (in the sense of shooting and hunting); game.

1590. "Āin, 27. Of Hunting (orig. Āin-i-Shikār).

"Superficial worldly observers see in killing an animal a sort of pleasure, and in their ignorance stride about, as if senseless, on the field of their passions. But deep enquirers see in hunting a means of acquisition of knowledge. . . . This is the case with His Majesty."—Āin, i. 282.

1609-10. "Sykary, which signifieth, seeking, or hunting."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 428.

1800. "250 or 300 horsemen . . . divided into two or three small parties, supported by our infantry, would give a proper shekar; and I strongly advise not to let the Mahratta boundary stop you in the pursuit of your game."—Sir A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Life of Munro, iii. 117.

1847. "Yet there is a charm in this place for the lovers of Shikār."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 3.

1866. "May I ask what has brought you to India, Mr. Cholmondeley? Did you come out for shikar, eh?"—Trevelyan, The Dawki Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 222.

Shikaree, Shekarry, s. A sportsman. The word is used in two ways:

1879. "Although the province (Pegu) abounds in large game, it is very difficult to discover, because there are no regular shikarees in the Indian acceptance of the word. Every village has its local shikaree, who lives by trapping and killing game. Taking life as he does, contrary to the principles of his religion, he is looked upon as damned by his neighbours, but that does not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Pollak, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

(b). as applied to the European sportsman himself; e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikaree." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-1875 by Mr. H. A. Leveson, under the name of 'The Old Shekarry.'

Shikār-gāh, s. Pers. A hunting-ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in shawl-work in Kashmīr and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. I., ch. 17, and notes).

Shikhō, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship.

Some correspondence arose in 1883, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burma, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by English envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no analogy whatever to that of shikhō, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude.

1855. "Our conductors took off their shoes at the gate, and the Woondouk made an ineffectual attempt to induce the Envoy to do likewise. They also, at four different places, as we advanced to the inner gate, dropt on their knees and shikhoed towards the palace."—Mission to Ava.

1882. "Another ceremony is that of shekhoing to the spire, the external emblem of the throne. All Burmans must do this at each of the gates, at the foot of the steps, and at intervals in between. . . ."—The Burman, His Life and Notions, ii. 206.

Shinbin, Shinbeam, etc., s. A term in the Burmese teak trade; apparently a corruption from Burm. shin-byin. The first monosyllable (shin) means 'to put together side by side,' and byin = 'plank,' the compound word being used in Burmese for 'a thick plank used in constructing the side of a ship.' The shinbin is a thick plank, about 15" wide by 4" thick, and running up to 25 feet in length (see Milburn, i. 47). It is not sawn, but split from green trees.

Madras Courier, 10th Nov.

Shinkali, or Shigala, n. p. A name by which the City and Port of Cranganore (q.v.) seems to have been known in the early Middle Ages. The name was probably formed from Tiruvanjiculam, mentioned by Dr. Gundert below. It is perhaps the Gingaleh of Rabbi Benjamin in our first quotation; but the data are too vague to determine this, though the position of that place seems to be in the vicinity of Malabar.

c. 1167. "Gingaleh is but three days distant by land, whereas it requires a journey of fifteen days to reach it by the sea; this place contains about 1,000 Israelites."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Wright's Early Travels, p. 117.

c. 1300. "Of the cities on the shore (of Malibār) the first is Sindābūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjārūr. . . . then Chinkali (or Jinkali), then Kilām."—Rashiduddin, see J. R. As. Soc., N. S., iv. pp. 342 and 345.

c. 1320. "Le pays de Manibār, appelé pays du Poivre, comprend les villes suivantes.

c. 1328. ". . . there is one very powerful King in the country where the pepper grows, and his kingdom is called Molebar. There is also the King of Singuyil. . . ."—Fr. Jordanus, p. 40.

1330. "And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrina (see Pandarani), and the other Cyngilin. . . ."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 75-76.

c. 1330. "Etiam Shāliyat (see Chalia) et Shinkala urbes Malabaricae sunt, quarum alteram Judaei incolunt. . . ."—Abulfeda, in Gildemeister, 185.

c. 1349. "And in the second India, which is called Mynibar, there is Cynkali, which signifieth Little India" (Little China) "for Kali is 'little.'"—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

1510. "Seigla alias et Chrongalor vocabatur, ea quam Cranganorium dicimus Malabaricae urbem, ut testatur idem Jacobus Indiarum episcopus ad calcem Testamenti Novi ab ipso exarati anno Graecorum 1821, Christi 1510, et in fine Epistolarum Pauli, Cod. as may be learned from the granite inscription at the northern entrance of the Tiruvanjiculam temple. . . .”—Ibid., 122.

Shintoo, Sintoo, s. Japanese Shintau, ‘The Way of the Gods.’ The primitive religion of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be the Seuto of Couto.*

1612. “But above all these idols they adore one Seuto, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that its abode is the Heavens.”—Couto, V. viii. 12.

1727. “Le Sinto qu’on appelle aussi Sinsju et Kamimitsi, est le Culte des Idoles, établi anciennement dans le pays. Sin et Kami sont les noms des Idoles qui font l’objet de ce Culte. Siu (sic) signifie la Foi, ou la Religion. Sinsja et au pluriel Sinsju, ce sont les personnes qui professent cette Religion.”—Kaempfer, Hist. de Japon, i. 176.

1770. “Far from encouraging that gloomy fanaticism and fear of the gods, which is inspired by almost all other religions, the Xinto sect had applied itself to prevent, or at least to moderate that disorder of the imagination.”—Raynal (E. T. 1777), i. 137.

1778. “The indigenous religion of the Japanese people, called in later times by the name of Shintau or Way of the Gods, in order to distinguish it from the way of the Chinese moral philosophers, and the way of Buddha, had, at the time when Confucianism and Buddhism were introduced, passed through the earliest stage of development.”—Westminster Review, N.S., No. cvii. 29.

Shireenbaf, s. Pers. Shīrīnbāf, ‘sweet-wool.’ A kind of fine cotton stuff, but we cannot say more precisely what.

c. 1843. “. . . one hundred pieces of shīrīnbāf. . . .”—Ten Baku, iv. 3.

1673. “. . . siring chintz, Broad Baftas. . . .”—Fryer, 88.

Shisham. See under Sissoo.

Shishmuhull, s. P. shishamahāl, lit. ‘glass apartment’ or palace. This is or was a common appendage of native palaces, viz., a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gimcrack aspect. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Villa Palagonia at Bagheria near Palermo.

* According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Sinto. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Seuto seems more likely to be a mistake for Sento.

1835. “The Shisha-mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded talc and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 365.

Shoe of Gold (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: “The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz. and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz., and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity” (Gloss. of Reference, 128).

The same form of ingot was probably the bālīsh (or yāstok) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, etc. Both of these latter words mean also ‘a cushion,’ which is perhaps as good a comparison as either ‘shoe’ or ‘boat.’ The word now used in C. Asia is yambū. There are cuts of the gold ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz., a corruption of Dutch Gold-schuyt.

1566. “. . . valuable goods exported from this country (China) . . . are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India in loaves in the shape of boats. . . .”—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391 b.

1611. “Then, I tell you, from China I could load ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 280 pardaos.”—Couto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, p. 155.

1676. “The Pieces of Gold mark’d Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollanders called Goltschut, that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Loaves of Gold. . . . The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money.”—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 8.

1702. “Sent the Moolah to be delivered the Nabob, Dewan, and Buxie 48 China Oranges . . . but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court; which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of gold, or so many thousand pagodas or rupees. —In Wheeler, i. 397.

1704. "Price Currant, July, 1704 (at Malacca). . . . Gold, China, in Shoos 94 Touch."—Lockyer, 70.

1862. "A silver ingot 'Yambu' weighs about 2 (Indian) seers . . . = 4 lbs., and is worth 165 Co.'s rupees. Koomoosh, also called 'Yambucha,' or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs . . . 5 yambuchas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of 'yambucha'; one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other . . . in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Yambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it."—Punjab Trade Report, App. cccxvi-xxviii. 1.

1875. "The yambú or kúrs is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is slightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashghar) ser = 30,000 grains English."—Report of Forsyth's Mission to Kashghar, 494.

Shoe-flower, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tamil shapattu-pu, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kempang sapatu means the same. Voigt gives shoe-flower as the English name, and adds: "Petals astringent, used by the Chinese to blacken their shoes (?) and eyebrows" (Hortus Suburbanus Calcuttensis, 116-117); see also Drury, s.v. The notion of the Chinese blackening their shoes is surely an error, but perhaps they use it to blacken leather for European use.

1791. "La nuit suivante . . . je joins ais pavots . . . une fleur de foule sapatte, qui sert aux cordonniers à teindre leurs cuirs en noir."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne.

This foule-sapatte is apparently some quasi Hindustani form of the name (phul-sabât?) used by the Portuguese.

Shoe-goose, s. This ludicrous corruption of the P. siyáh-gosh, lit. 'black-ear,' i.e. lynx (Felis Caracal) occurs in the following passage:

1727. "Antelopes, Hares and Foxes, are their wild Game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them a Shoe-goose."—A. Ham., i. 124.

1802. ". . . between the cat and the lion, are the . . . syagush, the lynx, the tiger-cat. . . ."—Ritson, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813. "The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Siyah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Memoirs, i. 277.

Shoke, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar. Hind. shauk.

1796. "This increased my shouq. . . for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindostanee modes of warfare."—Mily. Memoirs of Lt.-Col. James Skinner, i. 109.

Shola, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tamil sholái.

1862. "At daylight . . . we left the Sisipara bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholas of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Peru and India, 356.

1876. "Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholas, as they are called."—M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 202.

Shoocka, s. Ar. Hind. shukka, (properly 'an oblong strip') a letter from a King to a subject.

1787. "I have received several melancholy Shukhas from the King (of Dehli) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

Shooldarry, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platts just published (Urdú, &c. Dictionary). This author spells the word chholdári, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhul in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is crammed into a bag when carried.

1808. "I have now a shoaldarree for myself, and a long paul (see pawl) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

Shraub, Shrobb, s. Ar. sharab; Hind. shrāb, wine. See under Sherbet.

Shroff, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. ṣarrāf (also ṣairāf, ṣairāf). The word is used by Europeans in China (as well as in India), and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next article). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission.

From the same root comes the Heb. šrēf, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi iii. 3: "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi." Only in Hebrew the goldsmith tests metal, whilst the šairaf tests coins. The Arab poet says of his mare, "Her forefeet scatter the gravel every mid-day, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the šairaf." *

1554. "Salaries of the officers of the Custom Houses, and other charges for these which the Treasurers have to pay."

Also to the Xarrafo, whose charge it is to see to the money, two pardaos a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred reis.—"Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 238.

1560. "There are in the city many and very wealthy carafos who change money."—Tenreiro, ch. i.

1584. "5 tangas make a seraphin of gold; but if one would change them into basaruchies (see budgrook, tanga, xerafin) he may have 5 tangas and 16 basaruchies, which ouerplus they call cerafagio. . . ."—Barvet, in Hakluyt, ii. 410.

1585. "This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the reals) have sold at 12 per cent. of Xarafaggio (shroffage), as this commission is called, from the word Xaraffo, which is the title of the banker."—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, Storia, p. 203.

1598. "There is in every place of the street exchangers of mony, by them called Xaraffos, which are all christian Jewes."—Linschoten, p. 66.

c. 1610. "Dans ce Marché . . . aussi sont les changeurs qu'ils nomment Cherafes, dont il y en a en plusieurs autres endroits; leurs boutiques sont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toutes couvertes de monnoye, dont ils payent tribut au Roy."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 39.

1673. "It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers."—Fryer, 413.

1697-8. "In addition to the cash and property which they had got by plunder, the enemy fixed two lacs of rupees as the price of the ransom of the prisoners . . . To make up the balance, the Sarráfs and merchants of Nandurbár were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent."—Kháfi Khán, in Elliot, vii. 362.

1750. ". . . the Irruption of the Morattoes into Carnatica, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; inso-much, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empire, but had a House in it; in a Word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Country People, and the Envy of all our European Neighbours."—Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co., 53-54.

1809. "I had the satisfaction of hearing the Court order them (i.e., Gen. Martin's executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow."—Ld. Valentia, i. 243.

Shroff, To, v. This verb is applied properly to the sorting of different rupees or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or agio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively 'to sift,' choosing the good (men, horses, facts, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

1788. "Shroffing schools are common in Canton, where teachers of the art keep bad dollars for the purpose of exercising their pupils; and several works on the subject have been published there, with numerous illustrations of dollars and other foreign coins, the methods of scooping out silver and filling up with copper or lead, comparisons between genuine and counterfeit dollars, the difference between native and foreign milling, etc., etc."—Giles, Glossary of Reference, p. 129.

1882. (The Compradore) "derived a profit from the process of shroffing which (the money received) underwent before being deposited in the Treasury."—The Bankers at Canton, p. 55.

Shrub, s. See under Sherbet.

Shulwaurs, s. Trowsers, or drawer rather, of the oriental kind, the same as pyjamas, long-drawers, or Mogul-breeches (qq.v.). The Persian is shalwār, which according to Prof. Max Müller is more correctly shulwār, from shul, 'the thigh,' related to Latin crus, cruris, and to Skt. kshura or khura, 'hoof' (see Pusey on Daniel, 570). Be this as it may, the Arabic form is sirwāl (vulg. sharwāl), pl. sarāwīl, and this appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, where the word occurs as σαράβαρα, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: "Et capillus capitis eorum non esset adustus, et sarabala eorum non fuissent immutata, et odor ignis non transisset per eos" (iii. 27). The original word is sarbātīn, pl. of sarbāla.

Luther however renders this Mantel; as the A. V. also does by coats.*

The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as jālbār, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as sālbār, among the Kalmaks as shālbār, whilst it reached Russia as sharavuri, Spain as zarauques, and Portugal as zarelos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, serabula, serabulla, sarabella, sarabola, sarabura and more!

In the 2d quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some case been interpreted as 'turbans.'

A. D. (?). "Καὶ ἐθεώρουν τοὺς ἄνδρας ὅτι οὐκ ἐκρίνεσαν τὸ πῦρ τοῦ σώματος αὐτῶν καὶ ἡ θριξὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς αὐτῶν οὐκ ἐφλογίσθη καὶ τα σ α ρ α β α ρ α αὐτῶν οὐκ ἠλλοιώθη, *καὶ ὁσμη πῦρὸς οὐκ ἦν ἐν αὐτοῖς."—Gr. Tr. of Dan. iii. 27.

A. D. 200. "Ἐν δὲ τοῖς Σκῦθαῖς Ἀντιφάνης ἔφη Σ α ρ α β α ρ α καὶ χιτῶνας πάντας ἐνδεδυκότες."—Julius Pollux, Onomast. vii. 13, sec. 59.

A. D. 500. "Σ α ρ α β α ρ α, τὰ περὶ τὰς κνημίδας (sic) ἐνδύματα."—Hesychius, s. v.

c. 636. "Sarabara sunt fluxa ac sinuosa vestimenta de quibus legitur in Daniele. . . . Et Publius: Vt quid ergo in ventre tuo Parthi Sarabara suspenderunt? Apud quosdam autem Sarabarae quaedam capitum tegmina nuncupantur qualia videmus in capite Magorum picta."—Isidorus Hispalensis, Orig. et Etym., lib. xix., ed. 1601, pp. 263-264.

c. 1000? "Σ α ρ α β α ρ α, — ἐσθῆς Περσικῆς ἔνιοι δὲ λέγουσι βρακία."—Suidas, s. v.

which may be roughly rendered:

"A garb outlandish to the Greeks,
Which some call Shalwārs, some call Breeks!"

c. 900. "The deceased was unchanged, except in colour. They dressed him then with sarāwīl, overhose, boots, a kurṭak and khaftān of gold-cloth, with golden buttons, and put on him a golden cap garnished with sable."—Ibn Fozlān, in Fræhn, p. 15.

c. 1300. "Disconsecratur altare eorum, et oportet reconciliari per episcopum . . .

* "It is not certain but that Luther and the A. V. are right. The word sarbalin means 'cloak' in the Gemara; and in Arabic sirbal is 'a garment, a coat of mail.' Perhaps quite an equal weight of scholarship would now lean (though with hesitation) towards the cloak or coat, and against the breeches theory.

"The Arabic word occurs in the Traditions of the Prophet (Bokhart, vii. 36).

"Of course it is certain that sarabara comes from the Persian, but not through Arabic. The Bedouins did not wear trowsers in the time of Ammianus, and don't do so now.

"The ordinary so-called LXX. editions of Daniel contain what is really the post-Christian version of Theodotion. The true LXX text has ὑποδύματα.

"It may be added that Jerome says both Aquila and Symmachus wrote saraballa."—W. R. S.

si intraret ad ipsum aliquis qui non esset Nestorius; si intraret etiam ad ipsum quicumque sine sorribulis vel capite cooperto."—Ricoldo di Monte Croce, in Peregrinatores Quatuor, 122.

1330. "Haec autem mulieres vadunt discalceatae portantes sarabulas usque ad terram."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., App. iv.

c. 1495. "The first who wore sarāwīl was Solomon. But in another tradition it is alleged that Abraham was the first."—The 'Beginnings,' by Syuti, quoted by Fræhn, p. 113.

1567. "Portauano braghese quasi alla turchesca, et anche saluari."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. f. 389.

1824. ". . . tell me how much he will be contented with? Can I offer him five Tomains, and a pair of crimson Shulwaurs?"—Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 179.

1881. "I used to wear a red shirt and velvetene sharovary, and lie on the sofa like a gentleman, and drink like a Swede."—Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, by Fedor Dostoyeffski, E. T., by Maria v. Thilo, 191.

Siam, n. p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Siyām. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sião as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camões also writes Syão for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use os Siameses for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o reyno Siame. But he also constantly says rey de Sião. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siam, identical with Shan (q. v.). "The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name of Sien-lo . . . The supplement to Matwanlin's Encyclopædia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chen-ching (or Cochinchina). 'It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hoh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A. D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hoh and united with the latter into one nation.'" See Marco Polo, 2d ed., Bk. III. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Laotian Shans, Thainyai, or Great T'ai, whilst the Sien or Siamese Proper were the T'ai Noi, or Little T'ai. See also Sornau.

1516. "Proceeding further, quitting the kingdom of Pegu, along the coast over against Malaca there is a very great kingdom of pagans which they call Danseam (of Anseam); the king of it is a pagan also, and a very great lord."—Barbosa (Lisbon Acad.), 369.

It is difficult to interpret this Anseam, which we find also in C. Federici below in the form Asion. But the An is probably a Malay prefix of some kind.

c. 1522. "The king (of Zzuba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 85.

"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the king of Siam, who is named Siri Zacebedera, and who inhabits Iudia" (see Judea).—Id., 156.

1525. "In this same Port of Pam (Pahang), which is in the kingdom of Syam, there was another junk of Malacca, the captain whereof was Alvaro da Costaa, and it had aboard 15 Portuguese, at the same time that in Joatane (Patane) they seized the ship of Andre de Bryto, and the junk of Gaspar Soarez, and as soon as this news was known they laid hands on the junk and the crew and the cargo: it is presumed that the people were killed, but it is not known for certain."—Lembrança das Cousas da India, 6.

"Vês Pam, Patâne, reinos e a longura
De Syão, que estes e outros mais sujeita;
Olho o rio Menão que se derrama
Do grande lago, que Chiamay se chiama."
Camões, x. 25.

By Burton:

"See Pam, Patane and in length obscure,
Siam that ruleth all with lordly sway;
behold Menam, who rolls his lordly tide from source Chiamái called, lake long and wide."

c. 1567. "Va etiandio ogn' anno per l'istesso Capitano (di Malacca) vn nauilio in Asion, a caricare di Verzino" (Brazil-wood).—Ces. Federici, in Ramus. iii. 396 v.

1598. " . . . . The king of Sian at this time is become tributarie to the king of Pegu. The cause of this most bloodie battaile was, that the king of Sian had a white Elephant."—Linschoten, p. 30.

1688. "The Name of Siam is unknown to the Siamese. 'Tis one of those words which the Portugues of the Indies do use, and of which it is very difficult to discover the Original. They use it as the Name of the Nation, and not of the Kingdom: And the Names of Pegu, Lao, Mogul, and most of the Names which we give to the Indian Kingdoms, are likewise National Names."—De la Loubère, E. T., p. 6.

Sicca. As will be seen by reference to the article Rupee, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined at the Company's different mints, or were current in the Company's territories. The term sicca (sikka, from Arab. sikka, 'a coining die,'—and 'coined money,'—whence P. sikka zadan, to coin) had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta or premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1793 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, so far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impress of the 19th year of Shâh 'Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 San Sikkah," 'struck in the 19th year,' was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176·13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1835, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Farak-hâbâd rupee) the proportion of 16:15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued however a ghostly existence for many years longer in the form of certain Government Book-debts in that currency. See also under Chick.

Sicleegur, s. H. ṣaikaḷgar, from Ar. ṣaikal, 'polish.' A furbisher of arms, a sword-armourer, a sword- or knife-grinder.

Sikh, Seikh, n.p. Panjābi-Hind. Sikh, 'a disciple' (from Skt. Śiṣhya) the distinctive name of the disciples of Nānak Shāh who in the 16th century established that sect, which eventually rose to warlike predominance in the Punjab, and from which sprang Ranjit Singh, the founder of the brief Kingdom of Lahore.

1781-2. "In the year 1128 of the Hedjra" (1716) "a bloody action happened in the plains of the Pendjab, between the Sycs and the Imperialists, in which the latter, commanded by Abdol-semed-Khan, a famous Viceroy of that province, gave those inhuman freebooters a great defeat, in which their General, Benda, fell into the victors' hands . . . He was a Syc by profession, that is one of those men attached to the tenets of Guru-Govind, and who from their birth or from the moment of their admission never cut or shave either their beard or whiskers or any hair whatever of their body. 1810. Williamson (V.M.) writes Seeks.

The following extract indicates the prevalence of a very notable error:—

1840. "Runjeet possesses great personal courage, a quality in which the Sikhs (sic) are supposed to be generally deficient."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, 83.

We occasionally about 1845-6 saw the word written by people in Calcutta, who ought to have known better, Sheiks.

Silboot, Silpet, Slippet, s. Domestic Hind. corruptions of 'slipper.' The first is an instance of "striving after meaning" by connecting it in some way with 'boot.'

Silladar, adj. and s. Hind. from Pers. silāh-dār, 'bearing or having arms,' from Ar. silāh, 'arms.' Its application is to a soldier, in a regiment of irregular cavalry, who provides his own arms and horse; and sometimes to regiments composed of such men—"a corps of Silladar Horse."

1766. "When this intelligence reached the Nawaub, he leaving the whole of his troops and baggage in the same place, with only 6000 stable horse, 9000 Sillahdars, 4000 regular infantry, and 6 guns . . . fell bravely on the Mahrattas . . ."—Mir Hussein Ali, H. of Hydr Naik, 173.

Sind, Scinde, &c., n.p. The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. The earlier Mahommedans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally these were, in fact, but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and sibilant tending in several parts of India (including the extreme east—compare Assam, Ahom—and the extreme west), as in some other regions, to exchange places.

But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sindi are not Indian, but a Sarmatic people mentioned by Ammianus (xxii. 8), Valerius Flaccus (vi. 86), and other writers.

The preceding extract is curious as showing the comparative value put upon Arabs, Khorāsānis (qu. Afghans?), Sindiis, Rumis (i. e. Turks), Fartakis (Arabs of Hadramaut?), &c.

Sindābūr, Sandabur, n.p. This is the name by which Goa was known to some of the old Arab writers. The identity was clearly established in Cathay and the Way Thither, pp. 444 and coli.

We will give quotations first, and then point out the grounds of identification.

A.D. 943. "Crocodiles abound, it is true, in the ajwān or bays formed by the Sea of India, such as that of Šindābūra in the Indian Kingdom of Baghira, or in the bay of Zābaj (see Java) in the dominion of the Maharāj."—Maṣ'ūdī, i. 207.

1013. "I have it from Ābū Yūsaf bin Muslim, who had it from Ābū Bakr of Faṣā at Šaimūr, that the latter heard told by Mūsā the Šindābūrī: 'I was one day conversing with the Šahib of Šindābūr, when suddenly he burst out laughing. . . . It was, said he, because there is a lizard on the wall, and it said, 'There is a guest coming to-day. . . . Don't you go till you see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said 'There is a ship of Oman come in.' Shortly after, people arrived carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a long lizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one. It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Šindābūr, so that now they hurt nobody.'—Ŷivre des Merveilles de l'Inde. V. der Lith et Devic, 157–158.

c. 1150. "From the city of Barūh (Barūch, i.e. Broach) following the coast, to Sindābūr 4 days.

"Sindābūr is on a great inlet where ships anchor. It is a place of trade, where one sees fine buildings and rich bazars."—Edrisi, i. 179.

c. 1300. "Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tāna; beyond them the country of Malibār. . . . The people are all Samānis (Buddhists), and worship idols. Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindābūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjarūr, then the country of Hīlī. . . ."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1330. "A traveller states that the country from Sindāpūr to Hanāwar towards its eastern extremity joins with Malabar. . . ."—Abulfeda, Fr. tr., II. ii.

115. Further on in his Tables he jumbles up (as Edrisi has done) Sindāpūr with Sindān (see St. John).

"The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tāna, Kaulam, Calicut, Fandarāna, Šālīyāt, Manjarūr, Fākanūr, Hanaur, Sandābūr, et cetera."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 177.

c. 1313–4. "Three days after setting sail we arrived at the Island of Sandābūr, within which there are 36 villages. It is surrounded by an inlet, and at the time of ebb the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at flow it is salt and bitter. There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Muslims when they conquered the island the first time. . . . We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . ."—Ibid., iv. 61–62.

1350, 1375. In the Medicean and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Cintabor and Chintabor respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1554. "24th Voyage; from Guvah-Sindābūr to Aden.

"If you start from Guvah-Sindābūr at the end of the season, take care not to fall on Cape Fāl," &c.—Mohit, in J.A.S.B., v. 564. The last quotation shows that Goa was known even in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindābūr, whatever Indian name the last part represented; probably, from the use of the šwād by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabor of the European maps, Chandāpūr rather than Sundāpūr. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connexion, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is that of a delta-island, and Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the natives as Tirvātī, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See under Salsette.) Its vicinity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we have shown to be Angediva (see that article), is another proof. Turning to Rashiduddin, the order in which he places Sindābūr, Faknūr (Baccanore), Manjarūr (Mangalore), Hīlī (Mt. D'Ely), is perfectly correct, if for Sindābūr we substitute Goa. The passage from Edrisi and one indicated from Abulfeda only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

Singalese, Cinghalese, n.p. Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon. The word is formed from Sinhala, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the original of most of the names given to it (see Ceylon). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it leads them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552. "That the Chinese (Chōis) were masters of the Chormandel Coast, of part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it . . . and because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingalla, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. 1.

1583. (The Cauchin Chineans) "are of the race of the Chingalays, which they say are the best kinde of all the Malabars."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1598. "... inhabited with people called Cingalas . . ."—Linschoten, 24.

c. 1610. "Ils tiennent donc que . . . les premiers qui y allerent, et qui les peuplerent (les Maldives) furent . . . les Cingalles de l'Isle de Ceylan."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 185.

1612. Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: "And as they spring from the Chins, who are the falsest heathen of the East . . . so are all they of this island the weakest, falsest, and most tricky people in all India, insomuch that, to this day, you never find faith or truth in a Chingalla."—V. i. 5.

1681. "The Chinguleys are naturally a people given to sloth and laziness: if they can but anyways live, they abhor to work . . ."—Knox, 32.

Singapore, Singapore, n.p. This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, 23d February, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the middle ages. This it derived from Sinhapura (Skt. 'Lion-city'), the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Barros ascribes great commercial importance. The Indian origin of the name, as of many other names and phrases which survive from the old Indian civilisation of the Archipelago, had been forgotten, and the origin which Barros was taught to ascribe to it is on a par with his etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology is founded are no doubt Malay: 'singah,' 'to tarry, halt, or lodge,' and 'pora-pora,' 'to pretend;' and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Sinhapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca.

The settlement of Hinduized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century A.D., for inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these, on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 30 or 40 years ago, for the accommodation of some wretched bungalow.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapore by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas. Its great adaptation for a mercantile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier. It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512. "And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incontinently, and started for the Strait of Cincapura, where they were to wait for the junks."—Correa, ii. 284-285.

1551. "Sed hactenus Deus nobis adsit omnibus. Amen. Anno post Christum natum, MDLI. Ex Freto Syncapurano."—Scti Franc. Xaverii Epistt. Pragae, 1667, Lib. III. viii.

1553. "Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malaca was one called Cingapura, a name which in their tongue means 'pretended halt' (falsa dimora); and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude . . . before the foundation of Malaca, at this same Cingapura . . . flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East . . ."—Barros, II. vi. 1.

"Mas na ponta da terra Cingapura
Verás, onde o caminho as naos se estreita;
Daqui, tornando a costa á Cynosura,
Se incurva, e para a Aurora se endireita."
Camões, x. 125.

By Burton :

"But on her Lands-end throned see Cingapur, where the wide sea-road shrinks to narrow way :
Thence curves the coast to face the Cynosure, and lastly trends Aurora-wards its lay."

1598. "... by water the coast stretcheth to the Cape of Singapura, and from thence it runneth upwards againe . . ."—Linschoten, 30.

1599. "In this voyage nothing occurred worth relating, except that, after passing the Strait of Sincapura, situated in one degree and a half, between the main land and a variety of islands . . . with so narrow a channel that from the ship you could jump ashore, or touch the branches of the trees on either side; our vessel struck on a shoal."—Viaggi di Carletti, ii. 208-9.

1606. "The 5th May came there 2 Prows from the King of Johore, with the Shah-bander of Singapoera, called Siri Raja Nagara . . ."—Valentijn, v. 331.

1616. "Found a Dutch man-of-war, one of a fleet appointed for the siege of Malaca, with the aid of the King of Acheen, at the entrance of the Straits of Singapore."—Sainsbury, i. p. 458.

1727. "In anno 1703 I called at Johore on my way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Sincapure, but I told him it could be of no use to a private Person, tho' a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in."—A. Ham. ii. 98.

1818. "We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something, but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground . . . My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapura."—Raffles, Letter to Marsden, dated Sandheads, Dec. 12th.

Singara, s. Hind. singhārā. The caltrop or water chestnut; Trapa
bispinosa, Roxb. (N. O. Haloragaceae).

1835. "Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhara (Trapa bispinosa), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains . . . The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine car-tilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullocks' backs two or three hundred miles to market."—Seeman, Rambles, &c. (1844), i. 101.

1839. "The nuts of Trapa bispinosa, called Singhara, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster that it yields the Government 12,000*l.* of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Runjeet Sing's share, from 96,000 to 128,000 ass-loads of this nut, yielded by the Lake of Oaller."—Royle, Hm. Plants,
i. 211.

Sipahsalar, s. A General-in-chief.
Pers. sipāh-sālār, 'army-leader,' the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sālār Jang,
i.e., 'the leader in war.'

c. 1000-1100. "Voici quelle étoit alors la gloire et la puissance des Orpélians dans le royaume. Ils possédoient la charge de sbasalar, ou de généralissime de toute la Georgie. Tous les officiers du palais étoient de leur dépendance."—Hist. of the Orpeliens, in St. Martin, Mem. sur l'Arménie, ii. 77.

c. 1358. "At 16 my father took me by the hand, and brought me to his own Monastery. He there addressed me; 'My boy, our ancestors from generation to generation have been commanders of the armies of the Jagtay and the Berlas family. The dignity of (Sepah Salar) Commander-in-Chief has now descended to me, but as I am tired of this world . . . I mean therefore to resign my public office . . .'"—Autob. Mem. of Timour, E. T., p. 22.

1712. "Omnibus illis superior est . . .
Sipah Salaar, sive Imperator generalis Regni, Fraesidem dignitate excipiens . . ."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. 73.

1726. A letter from the Heer Van Maat-zuiker "to His Highness Chan Chanaan, Sapperselaar, Grand Duke, and General in Chief of the Great Mogol in Assam, Bengal,
&c."—Valentijn, v. 173.

1755. "After the Sipahsalar Hydur, by his prudence and courage, had defeated the Mahrattas, and recovered the country taken by them, he placed the government of Seringaputtan on a sure and established basis . . ."—Meer Hussein Ali Khan, H. of Hydur Naik, O. T. F., p. 61.

Sircar, s. Hind. from Pers. sarkār, 'head (of) affairs.' This word has very divers applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.

(a.) The State, the Government, the Supreme authority; also 'the Master' or head of the domestic government. Thus a servant, if asked 'Whose are those horses?' in replying 'They are the sarkār's'—, may mean according to circumstances, that they are Government horses, or that they belong to his own master.

(b.) In Bengal the word is applied to a domestic servant who is a kind of house-steward, and keeps the accounts of household expenditure, and makes miscellaneous purchases for the family; also, in merchants' offices, to any native accountant or native employed in making purchases, &c.

(c.) Under the Mahomedan Governments, as in the time of the Mogul Empire, and more recently in the Deccan, the word was applied to certain extensive administrative divisions of territory. In its application in the Deccan it has been in English generally spelt Circar, q.v.

1800. "Would it not be possible and proper to make people pay the circar according to the exchange fixed at Seringapatam?"—Wellington, i. 60.

b.—

1777. "There is not in any country in the world, of which I have any knowledge, a more pernicious race of vermin in human shape than are the numerous cast of people known in Bengal by the appellation of Sircars; they are educated and trained to deceive."—Price's Tracts, i. 24.

1810. "The Sircar is a genius whose whole study is to handle money, whether receivable or payable, and who contrives either to confuse accounts, when they are adverse to his view, or to render them most expressively intelligible, when such should suit his purpose."—Williamson, V. M., i. 200.

1822. "One morning our Sircar, in answer to my having observed that the articles purchased were highly priced, said, 'You are my father and my mother, and I am your poor little child. I have only taken 2 annas in the rupee dustoorie'" (q. v.).—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 21-22.

1834. "And how the deuce, asked his companion, 'do you manage to pay for them?' "Nothing so easy,—I say to my Sirkar: 'Baboo, go pay for that horse 2000 rupees, and it is done, Sir, as quickly as you could dock him.'"—The Baboo and Other Tales, i. 13.

c. 1590. "In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 kusbahs" (see Cusba), "the revenue of which he settled for ten years at 3 Ardds, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 55,246 Dams" (q. v., 3,62,97,55,246 dams = about 9 millions sterling).—Ayeen Akbery, E. T. by Gladwin, 1800, ii. 1.

Sirdar, s. H. from P. sardār, and less correctly sirdār, 'a leader, a commander, an officer'; a Chief, or Lord; the head of a set of palankin-bearers, and hence the 'sirdār-bearer,' or elliptically 'the Sirdār,' is in Bengal the style of the valet or body-servant, even when he may have no others under him (see Bearer).

1808. "I, with great difficulty, knocked up some of the villagers, who were nearly as much afraid as Christie's Will, at the visit of a Sirdār" (here an officer).—Life of Leyden.

1826. "Gopie's father had been a Sirdar of some consequence."—Pandurang Hari, 174.

Sirdrars, s. This is the name which native valets ("bearers") give to common drawers (underclothing). A friend (Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E.) has suggested the origin, which is doubtless "short drawers" in contradistinction to long-drawers, or pyjamas (qq.v.). A common bearer's pronunciation is sirdrāj; as a chest of drawers also is called 'drāj ka almaira.' See Almyra.

Sirky, s. H. sīrkī. A kind of unplatted matting formed by laying the fine cylindrical culms from the upper part of the Saccharum Sara, Roxb. (see Surkunda) side by side, and binding them in single or double layers. This is used to lay under the thatch of a house, to cover carts and palankins, to make chicks (q.v.) and table-mats, and for many other purposes of rural and domestic economy.

1810. "It is perhaps singular that I should have seen seerky in use among a groupe of gypsies in Essex. In India these itinerants, whose habits and characters correspond with this intolerable species of banditti, invariably shelter themselves under seerky."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 490.

Sirris, s. Hind. Siris; the tree Acacia Lebbek, Benth., indigenous in S. India, the Sātpura range, Bengal, and the sub-Himalayan tract; cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere. A closely kindred sp., A. Julibrissin, Boivin, affords a specimen of scientific Hobson-Jobson; the specific name is a corruption of Gulab-reshm, 'silk-flower.'

Sissoo, also Shisham, s. H. sīsū, sīsūn, shīsham; Arab. sāsum or sāmīn; the tree Dalbergia Sissoo, Roxb. (N. O.

Leguminosae), and its wood. This is excellent, and valuable for construction, joinery, boat- and carriage-building, and furniture. It was the favourite wood for gun-carriages as long as the supply of large timber lasted. It is now much cultivated in the Punjab plantations. The tree is indigenous in the sub-Himalayan tract; and believed to be so likewise in Beluchistan, Guzerat, and Central India. Another sp. of Dalbergia (D. latifolia) affords the black wood (q.v.) of S. and W. India.

There can be little doubt that one or more of these species of Dalbergia afforded the sesamine wood spoken of in the Periplus, and in some old Arabic writers. A quotation under Black wood shews that this wood was exported from India to Chaldaea in remote ages.

Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt, see Forskål (quoted by Royle, Hindu Medicine, 128). Royle notices the resemblance of the name of the Biblical shittim wood to shisham.

c. A.D. 80. "... Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers, and beams of teak (ξύλων σαγάλων και δοκῶν) . . . and logs of shisham (θαλάσσιον σασαμίνων) . . ."—Periplus Maris Erythr., cap. 36.

c. 545. "These again are passed on from Siedlaba to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown, and Kalliana, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (σασαμίνα ξύλα), and other wares."—Cosmas, lib. xi.

? before 1200.

"There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove, And the plant of Zinj, and al-sāsīm, and pepper . . ."

Verses on India by Abul-dhalī, the Sindī, quoted by Kazvini, in Gildemeister, p. 218.

1810. "Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with saul . . . This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, of a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 71.

1839. "As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2d ed. (1851), p. 102.

Sitting-up. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated in the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1780. "When a young lady arrives at Madras, she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex, and gentlemen of the settlement."—Munro's Narrative, 56.

1795. "You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. . . . I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors. . . . I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for caps or petticoats for any lady. . . ."—T. Munro to his Sister, in Life, i. 169.

1810. "Among the several justly exploded ceremonies we may reckon that . . . of 'Sitting up' . . . This 'Sitting up,' as it was termed, generally took place at the house of some lady of rank or fortune, who, for three successive nights, threw open her mansion for the purpose of receiving all . . . who chose to pay their respects to such ladies as might have recently arrived in the country."—Williamson, V. M., i. 113.

Sittringy, s. H. from Ar. shīṭ-ranṣī, and that from Pers. shātrang, 'chess,' which is again of Skt. origin: chaturanga (see under Sadras).

A carpet of coloured cotton, now usually made in stripes, but no doubt originally, as the name implies, in chequers.

1673. "They pull off their Slippers, and after the usual Salams, seat themselves in Choultries, open to some Tank of purling Water; commonly spread with Carpets or Siturngees."—Fryer, 93.

1785. "To be sold by public auction . . . the valuable effects of Warren Hastings, Esquire. . . . carpets and sittringees."—In Seton-Karr, i. 111.

Siwalik, n. p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himalaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as dāns (see dhoon). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahomedan historians the term Siwālikh is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Nāgaur) and Mandāwar the predecessor of modern Jodhpūr, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwālikh) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Mālwa. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himalāya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Cherchfedin (Shariffuddin 'Alī of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwālik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence (in a list of Indian national names) in the Vishnu Purāna, of the Saivālas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with which the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purāna, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwālik as given in several of the quotations below, is from sawālākh, 'One lakh and a quarter'; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot's extracts by the interpolated phrase 'Siwālik Hills,' where it is evident from Raverty's version of the Ṭabakāt-i-Nāsiri that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himalayan range is quite modern.

It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquemont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cautley, at Sahāranpūr, very shortly before Falconer's arrival there. Jacquemont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: "la première chaîne de montagnes que j'appellerai les montagnes de Dehra." The first occurrence that we can find is in a paper by Falconer on the 'Aptitude of the Himalayan Range for the Culture of the Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below.

A year later, in the account of the Sivatherium fossil, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Siwālik, and its alleged etymology.

It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connexion of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Siva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Bernier's Travels, we find Siba given as the name of a province about Hurdwar; and the same name occurs in the same connexion in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahāngir, (Elliot, vi. 382).

c. 1300. "Of the cities on the shore the first is Sandabūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjārūr, then the country of (Fandarainā), then Jangli" (Jinkali), "then Kūlam. . . . After these comes the country of Sawālāk, which comprises 125,000 cities and villages. After that comes Mālwā" (but in some MSS. Mālvā).—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

Rashiduddin has got apparently much astray here, for he brings in the Siwālik territory at the far end of Malabar. But the mention of Mālwā as adjoining is a probable indication of the true position,* and this is in a manner confirmed by the next quotation from a Portuguese writer who places the region inland from Guzerat.

The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk-bags, the tails of the mountain-cow, saffron, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewālik-Parbat. In the language of Hind Sawālāk means a lak and a quarter (or 125,000), and Parbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from some parts of Hindustān, such as Lahore, Sehrend, and Sambal, it is seen white on them all the year round."—Barber, p. 313.

1834. "On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewalick, which commence at Roopur, on the Satlej, and run down a long way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Himálayas; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Sehárampur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jumna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Sehárampur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewalík hills."—Falconer, in J. A. S. B., iii. 182.

1835. "We have named the fossil Sivatherium from Siva the Hindu god, and Enpior, bellua. The Siwalík, or Sub-Himalayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Látiah or edge of the roof of SIVA's dwelling in the Himálaya, and hence they are called the Siva-ala or Sib-ala, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewalík of the English.

"The fossil has been discovered in a tract which may be included in the Siwalík range, and we have given the name of Sivatherium to it, to commemorate the remarkable formation, so rich in new animals. Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahant, or High Priest at Dehra, is as follows:—

"Sewalík, a corruption of Siva-walla, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Ganges, from having been the residence of ISWARA SIVA and his son GANES."—Falconer and Cautley, in Asiatic Researches, xix., p. 2.

Sling, Seling, n. p. This is a name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mart in the direction of China which supplies various articles of trade. Its occurrence in Trade Returns at one time caused some discussion as to its identity, but there can be no doubt that it is Si-ning (Fu) in Kan-su. The name Sling is also applied, in Ladák and the Punjab, to a stuff of goat's wool made at the place so-called.

Sloth, s. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur, (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

Snake-stone, s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th volume of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the result of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone.

There is another article in the As. Res. xvi. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zehr Mohereh, or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zahr muhra, where zahr = poison, muhra = 'a kind of polished shell,' 'a bead,' applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

c. 1666. "C'est dans cette Ville de Diu que se font les Pierres de Cobra si renommées: elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle, et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre; et après cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées. . . . Il faut faire sortir avec une écuille, un peu de sang de la plaie, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle même."—Thevenot, v. 97.

1673. "Here are also those Elephant Legged St. Thomeans, which the unbiassed Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venom of a certain Snake, by which the Jaugies or Pilgrims furnish them with a Factitious Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poyson to all deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poyson; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulency therein, discovered by its Greenness."—Fryer, 53.

c. 1676. "There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doublon?); and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idoloter's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. . . . If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incised; and the Stone being appli'd thereto, will not fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in Womans-milk, or for want of that, in Cows-milk. . . . There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for there it will give a leap, and fix to the Palate. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; for if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boyling, and rise in little bubbles. . . ."—Tavernier, E. T., Pt. ii., 155.

Tavernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra :

"This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drank in water," etc., etc.—Ibid.

1690. "The thing which he carried . . . is a Specific against the Poison of Snakes . . . and therefore obtained the name of Snake-stone. It is a small artificial Stone. . . . The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mixt with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu. . . ."—Ovington, 260-261.

1712. "Pedra de Cobra: ita dictus lapis, vocabulo a Lusitanis imposito, adversus viperarum morsus præstat auxilium, externè applicatus. In serpente, quod vulgò credunt, non invenitur, sed ære secretâ fabricatur à Brahmanis. Pro dextro et felici usu, oportet adesse geminos, ut cum primus veneno saturatus vulnuscule decidit, alter surrogari illico in locum possit. . . Quo ipso feror, ut istis lapidibus nihil efficacie inesse credam, nisi quam actuali frigiditate suâ, vel absorbendo præstant."—Kœmpfer, Amoen. Exot. 395-7.

1772. "Being returned to Roode-Zand, the much celebrated Snake-stone (Slangsteen) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and costs several, frequently 10 or 12, rix dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tubulated with very minute pores. . . . When it is applied to any part that has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; as soon as it is saturated, it falls off of itself. . . ."—Thunberg, Travels, E. T., i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796. "Of the remedies to which cures of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Bramin."—Patrick Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820. "Another kind of snake-stone . . . was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthy smell when breathed on, and had no absorbent or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much valued, and for adequate reason if true, 'it had saved the lives of four men.'"—Dr. Dary, in As. Res., xiii. 318.

1860. "The use of the Pamboo-Kaloo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singalese by the itinerant snake-charmers who resort to the island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses." . . . (These follow.) . . . "As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me, as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is 'a piece of charred bone which has been filled with blood, perhaps several times, and then charred again.' . . . The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has had time to be carried into the system. . . ."—Emerson Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1872. "With reference to the snake-stones, which, when applied to the bites, are said to absorb and suck out the poison, . . . I have only to say that I believe they are perfectly powerless to produce any such effect . . . when we reflect on the quantity of poison, and the force and depth with and to which it is injected . . . and the extreme rapidity with which it is hurried along in the vascular system to the nerve centres, I think it is obvious that the application of one of these stones can be of little use in a real bite of a deadly snake, and that a belief in their efficacy is a dangerous delusion."—Fayrer, Thanatophidia of India, pp. 38 and 40.

Sneaker, s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it sînîgar. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from sînî in the sense of 'china-ware'; or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a salver,' &c.

But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grose's Lexicon Balatronicum, with the explanation 'a small bowl;' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of last century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1714. "Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these pert phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter. . . .

Sofala, n. p. Ar. Sufāla, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more than 2° south of the Zambesi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1150. “This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofāla. . . The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron; of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofāla. The people of the islands . . . come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India . . . for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofāla.”—Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220. “Sofāla is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj . . . wares are carried to them, and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it . . . Sofālī gold is well-known among the Zenj merchants.”—Yāqūt, Mu’jam al-Buldān, s.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yāqūt describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilized races; e.g., in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in the Clove Islands; to the Veddas of Ceylon, to the Poliards of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese. See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Priaulx, in J. R. As. Soc., xviii. 348 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tenment’s Ceylon, i. 593 seqq.; Rawlinson’s Herodotus, under Bk. iv. ch. 196.

c. 1330. “Sofāla is situated in the country of the Zenj. According to the author of the Kanūn, the inhabitants are Muslim. Ibn Sayd says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopard-skin.”—Abulfeda, Fr. Tr., i. 222.

c. 1330. “A merchant told me that the town of Sofāla is a half month’s march distant from Culna (Quiloa), and that from Sofāla to Yūfi (Nūfi) . . . is a month’s march. From Yūfi they bring gold-dust to Sofāla.”—Ibn Batuta, ii. 192–3.

1499. “Coming to Moçambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Qofāla, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Qofāla, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea. . . .”—Correia, Lendas, i. 134–135.

1516. “. . . at xviii. leagues from them there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors established themselves there a long time ago on account of the great trade in gold, which they carry on with the Gentiles of the mainland.”—Barbosa, 4.

1523. “Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Urmuz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet to Qoffala and the ports of that coast, as that is forbidden by the King our lord. . . .”.—Treaty of Dom Duarte de Menezes, with the King of Ormuz, in Botelho, Tombo, 80.

1553. “Vasco da Gama . . . was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Qofāla, so famous in those parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade. . . ."—Barros, l. iv. 3.

" . . . Fizemos desta costa algum desvio
Deitando para o pégo toda a armada:
Porque, ventando Noto manso e frio,
Não nos apanhasse a agua da enseada,
Que a costa faz alli daquella banda,
Donde a rica Sofala o ouro manda."

Camões, v. 73.

By Burton:

'off from the coast-line for a spell we stood,
till deep blue water 'neath our kelsons lay;
for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leewards to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore."

1665.

"Mombaza and Quiloea and Melind, and Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south."

Paradise Lost, xi.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaces the accent, reading Sófala.

1727. "Between Delagoa and Mosambuque is a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Suffola and Cucama, but now by the Portuguese, who know that country best, is called Sena."—A. Ham., i. 8.

Sola, vulg. Solar, s. This is properly H. sholā, corrupted by the Bengālī inability to utter the shibboleth, to solā, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual "striving after meaning." Sholā is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N. O. Leguminosae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sola Topees, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g., for slips of tinder, for making models, &c. The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 30 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, and in Tamil, neṭṭi. Solar hats are now often advertised in London.

1836. "I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he used for his very large and heavy fishing-nets; each float was formed of eight pieces of sholā, tied together by the ends. . . . When this light and spongy pith is wetted, it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 100.

1872. "In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the solā; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp . . ."—Govinda Samanta, i. 10.

1878. "My solar topee (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 164.

1885. "I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar topee (or sun-helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazaars, in a grilling sunshine."—A Professional Visit in Persia, St. James's Gazette, March 9th.

Sombrero, s. Port. sombreiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella.

1503. "And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochín) in his boats which they call tonces (see Doney) . . . and in the tone of the King went his Sombremos, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in height. These are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is there in person, as it were his pennon or royal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like."—Correa, i. 378.

c. 1630. "Betwixt towns men usually travel in Chariots drawn by Oxen, but in Towns upon Palamkeens, and with Sombremos de Sol over them."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 46.

1657. "A costé du cheval il y a un homme qui esvente Wistnou, afin qu'il ne reçoive point d'incommodité soit par les mouches, ou par la chaleur; et à chaque costé on porte deux Zombremos, afin que le Soleil ne luise pas sur luy. . . ."—Abr. Roger, Fr. Tr., ed. 1670, p. 223.

1673. "None but the Emperor have a Sombrero among the Moguls."—Fryer, 36.

1727. "The Portuguese ladies . . . sent to beg the Favour that he would pick them out some lusty Dutch Men to carry their Palenqueens and Somereras or Umbrellas."—A. Ham., i. 338.

Sombrero, Channel of the, n. p. The channel between the northern part of the Nicobar group, and the southern part embracing the Great and Little Nicobar, has had this name since the early Portuguese days. The origin of the name is given by A. Hamilton below. The indications in C. Federici and Hamilton are probably not accurate. They do not agree with those given by Horsburgh.

1566. "Si passa per il canale di Nicubar, ouero per quello del Sombrero, li quali son per mezzo l'isola di Sumatra. . . ."—C. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

1727. "The Islands off this Part of the Coast are the Nicobars. . . . The northernmost Cluster is low, and are called the Carnicubars. . . . The middle Cluster is fine champain Ground, and all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somerera Islands, because on the South End of the largest Island, is an Hill that resembleth the Top of an Umbrella or Somerero.—A. Ham., ii. 68.

1843. "Sombbrero Channel, bounded on the north by the Islands of Katchull and Noncowry, and by Merve or Passage Island on the South side, is very safe and about seven leagues wide."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 59-60.

Sonaparanta, n. p. This is a quasi classical name, of Indian origin, used by the Burmese Court in State documents and formal enumerations of the style of the King, to indicate the central part of his dominions; Skt. Suvarna (Pali Sona) prānta (or perhaps aparānta), 'golden frontier-land,' or something like that. There can be little doubt that it is a survival of the names which gave origin to the Chrysē of the Greeks. And it is notable, that the same series of titles embraces Tambadīpa ('Copper Island' or Region) which is also represented by the Chalcitis of Ptolemy.

(Ancient.) "There were two brothers resident in the country called Sunāparanta, merchants, who went to trade with 500 wagons. . . ."—Legends of Gotama Buddha, in Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, 259.

1636. "All comprised within the great districts . . . of Tsa-Koo, Tsa-lan, Laygain, Phoung-len, Kalé, and Thoung-thwot is constituted the Kingdom of Thuna-paranta. All within the great districts of Pagán, Ava, Penya, and Myen-Zain, is constituted the Kingdom of Tampadewa. . . ." (etc.).—From an Inscription at the Great Pagoda of Koung-Mhoo-dau, near Ava; from the MS. Journal of Major H. Burney, accompanying a Letter from him, dated 11th September, 1830, in the Foreign Office, Calcutta.

Burney adds: "The Ministers told me that by Thunaparanta they mean all the countries to the northward of Ava, and by Tampa-dewa all to the southward. But this inscription shows that the Ministers themselves do not exactly understand what countries are comprised in Thunaparanta and Tampa-dewa."

1767. "The King despotick; of great Merit, of great Power, Lord of the Countries Thonaprondah, Tompdevah, and Camboja, Sovereign of the Kingdom of BURAGHMAGH, the Kingdom of Siam and Hughen (?), and the Kingdom of Cassay."—Letter from the King of Burma, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 106.

1795. "The Lord of Earth and Air, the Monarch of extensive Countries, the Sovereign of the Kingdoms of Sonahparindā, Tombadeva. . . . etc. . . ."—Letter from the King to Sir John Shore, in Symes, 487.

1855. "His great, glorious and most excellent Majesty, who reigns over the Kingdoms of Thunaparanta, Tampadeeva, and all the great umbrella-wearing chiefs of the Eastern countries, the King of the Rising Sun, Lord of the Celestial Elephants, and Master of many white Elephants, and great Chief of Righteousness. . . ."—King's Letter to the Governor-General (Lord Dalhousie), 2nd Oct., 1855.

Soodra, Sooder, s. Skt. śūdr. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India, there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the higher castes among the (so-called) Sudras come next after the Brahmins in social rank, and śūdra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630. "The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderies."—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

1651. "La quatrième lignée est celle des Soudraes: elle est composée du commun peuple: cette lignée a sous soy beaucoup et diverses familles, dont une chacune prétend surpasser l'autre. . . ."—Abr. Roger, Fr. ed. 1670, p. 8.

1674. "The . . . Chudrer (these are the Nayres)."—Faria y Sousa, ii. 710.

1717. "The Brahmins and the Tschudirers are the proper persons to satisfy your Enquiries."—Phillips, 14.

1858. "Such of the Aborigines as yet remained were formed into a fourth class, the Čudra, a class which had no rights but only duties."—Whitney, Or. and Ling. Studies, ii. 6.

1867. "A Brahman does not stand aloof from a Soudra with a keener pride than a Greek Christian shows towards a Copt."—Dixon, New America, 7th ed. i. 276.

Soojy, Soojee, s. Hind. śūjī; a word curiously misinterpreted ("the coarser part of pounded wheat") by the usually accurate Shakespear. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for English tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin simella; Germ. Semmel-bröden, and old English simnel cakes.

A kind of porridge made with soojee is often called soojee simply.

1810. "Bread is not made of flour, but of the heart of the wheat, which is very fine, ground into what is called soojy. . . . Soojy is frequently boiled into 'stirabout' for breakfast, and eaten with milk, salt and butter; though some of the more zealous may be seen to moisten it with porter."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 135-136.

1878. "Sujee flour, ground coarse, and water."—Life in the Mojussil, i. 213.

Soorky, s. Pounded brick used to mix with limo to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. surkhi, 'red-stuff.'

c. 1770. "The terrace roofs and floors of the rooms are laid with fine pulverized stones, which they call zurkee; these are mixed up with lime-water, and an inferior kind of molasses, and in a short time grow as hard and as smooth, as if the whole were one large stone."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 514.

1784. "One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1400 maunds of soorky."—Notifu. in Seton-Karr, i. 34; see also ii. 15.

1811. "The road from Calcutta to Baracpore . . . like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them."—Solvyns, Les Hindous, iii.

The word is misused as well as miswritten here. The substance in question is khoa, q.v.

Soorma, s. Hind. from Pers. surma. Sulphuret of antimony, used for darkening the eyes, kuhl of the Arabs. the stimmi and stibium of the ancients. "With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called soormee (ee is the feminine termination in Hindust.), and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake not of recent occurrence only, as Sprengel says, 'Distinguit vero Plinius marem a femina'" (Royle on Ant. of Hindu Medicine, 100).

Soosie, s. Hind. from Pers. sūsī. Some kind of silk cloth, but we know not what kind. See passage from 1690, Ovington, under Alleja.

1784. "Four cassimeers of different colours; Patna dimity, and striped soosies."—In Seton-Karr, i. 42.

Sophy, n.p. The name by which the King of Persia was long known in Europe—"The Sophy," as the Sultan of Turkey was "The Turk" or "Grand Turk," and the K. of Delhi the "Great Mogul." This title represented Sūfi, Safavi, or Safi, the name of the dynasty which reigned over Persia for more than two centuries (1499-1722, nominally to 1736). The first king of the family was Isma'il, claiming descent from 'Ali and the Imāms, through a long line of persons of saintly reputation at Ardebil. The surname of Sūfi or Safi assumed by Isma'il is generally supposed to have been taken from Shaikh Safi-ud-din, the first of his more recent ancestors to become famous, and who belonged to the class of Sūfis or philosophic devotees. After Isma'il the most famous of the dynasty was Shāh Abbās (1585-1629).

1598. "And all the Kings continued so with the name of Xa, which in Persia is a King, and Ishmael is a proper name, whereby Xa Ismael, and Xa Thamas are as much as to say King Ismael, and King Thamas, and of the Turkes and Rumes are called Suffy or Soffy, which signifieth a great Captaine."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.

1601. "Sir Toby. Why, man, he's a very devil: I have not seen such a frago . . . They say, he has been fencer to the Sophy."—Twelfth Night, III. iv.

1626. "Were it to bring the Great Turk bound in chains Through France in triumph, or to couple up The Sophy and great Prester-John together; I would attempt it."—Beaum. & Fletch., The Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

c. 1630. "Ismael at his Coronation proclaim'd himself King of Persia by name of Pot-Shaw-Ismael-Sophy. Whence that word Sophy was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian idiom, signifying Wool, of which the Shashes are made that ennobled his new order. Whether the name was from Sophy his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophos imposed upon Aydar at his conquest of Trebizond by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia Sophy's: but I see no reason for it; since Ismael's son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Soffee, but casual. — Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, 286.

Souba, Soobah, s. Hind. from Pers. šūba. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Šubah of the Deccan, the Šubah of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Šubadar, 'the Viceroy' (over a šūba). It is also "among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 ṭarafs" (Wilson).

c. 1594. "In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sirkars. . . . The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Soobadar . . . upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lacks of beetle. The names of the Soobahs were Allahabad, Agra, Owdh, Ajmeer, Ahmedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Dehly, Cabul, Lahoor, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandeess, and Ahmednagur, they were formed into three Soobahs, increasing the number to 15." — Ayeen (Gladwin), ii. 1-5.

Soubadar, Subadar, s. Hind. from Pers. šubadar, 'one holding a šūba' (see preceding art.).

(a). The Viceroy, or Governor of a šūba.

(b). A local commandant or chief officer.

(c). The chief native officer of a company of Sepoys; under the original constitution of such companies, its actual captain.

Soursop, s. (a). The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the custard-apple (q.v.). This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalized at Bombay. The forms soursop and sweet-sop are, we believe, West Indian.

(b). In a note to the passage quoted below, Grainger identifies the soursop with the suirsack of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the E. Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the common Jack fruit (q.v.), the 'sour-jack,' in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

Sowar, Suwar, s. Pers. sawār, 'a horseman.' A native cavalry soldier; a mounted orderly.

1824-5. ". . . The sowars who accompanied him."—Heber, Orig. i. 404.

1827. "Hartley had therefore no resource save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar . . . who rode before him."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

Sowar, Shooter, s. Hind. from Pers. shutr-sawār, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sowar is quite misused by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaun (q.v.).

1834. "I . . . found a fresh horse at Sufter Jung's tomb, and at the Kutub a couple of riding camels and an attendant Shutur Suwar."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 129.

1840. "Sent a Shuta Sarwar (camel driver) off with an express to Simla."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runj. Singh, 179.

1842. "At Peshawur, it appears by the papers I read last night, that they have camels, but no sowars, or drivers."—Letter of D. of Wellington, in Indian Administration of Ld. Ellenborough, 228.

Sowarry, Suwarree, s. Hind. from Pers. sawārī. A cavalcade, a cortège of mounted attendants.

1803. "They must have tents, elephants, and other sowary; and must have with them a sufficient body of troops to guard their persons."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Munro, i. 346.

1809. "He had no sawarry."—Ld. Valentia, i. 388.

1814. "I was often reprimanded by the Zemindars and native officers, for leaving the suwarree, or state attendants, at the outer gate of the city, when I took my evening excursion."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 420.

1827. "Orders were given that on the next day all should be in readiness for the Sowarree, a grand procession, when the Prince was to receive the Begum as an honoured guest."—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

c. 1831. "Je tâcherai d'éviter toute la poussière de ces immenses sowarris."—Jacquemont, Corresp. ii. 121.

Sowarry Camel. A swift or riding camel. See Sowar, Shooter—.

1835. "I am told you dress a camel beautifully," said the young Princess, "and I was anxious to . . . ask you to instruct my people how to attire a sawāri camel." This was flattering me on a very weak point: there is but one thing in the world that I perfectly understand, and that is how to dress a camel."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 36.

Sowcar, s. Hind. sāhūkār; alleged to be from sādhā, 'right,' and kār, 'doer,' Guj. sāvākār. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803. "You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any man who will give it you, for bills."—Wellington, Desp., ii. 1 (ed. 1837).

1826. "We were also sahoukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced moneys upon interest."—Pandurang Hari, 174.

Soy, s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese si-yau. * Chin. shi-yu. It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Himalaya and E. Asia, and much cultivated, viz. Glycine Soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soya hispida, Moench.) boiled down and fermented.

1679. "... Mango and Saio, two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Journal of John Locke, in Ld. King's Life of L., i. 249.

1688. "I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence the true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt."—Dampier, ii. 28.

1690. "... Souy, the choicest of all Sawces."—Ovington, 397.

1776. An elaborate account of the preparation of Soy is given in Thunberg's

Travels, E. T., iv. 121-122; and more briefly by Kaempfer on the page quoted above.

Spin, s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of 'Spinster.'

Sponge Cake, s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish-cake. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880. "There is a cake called kasateira resembling sponge-cake . . . It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Castilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 235.

Spotted-Deer. Axis maculatus of Gray, H. Chital.

1673. "The same Night we travelled easily to Megatana, using our Fowling-Pieces all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chitreles, or Spotted Deer."—Fryer, 71.

1682. "This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Oct. 16th.

Squeeze, s. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal exaction. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the malatolta of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1882. "If the licence (of the Hong merchants) . . . was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeezes' for contributions to public works, . . . for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity . . . as well as for the often imaginary . . . damage caused by the overflowing of the 'Yangtse Keang' or the 'Yellow River.'"—The Pankwae at Canton, p. 86.

Station, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

1866.

"And if I told how much I ate at one Mofussil station, I'm sure 'twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."

(Trevelyan) The Dawki Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. p. 391.

"Who asked the Station to dinner, and allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 231.

Stevadore, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship, and to unload it. The verb estivar is used in both Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador is given in the Sp. Dictionaries only in the sense of a wool-packer, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Skeat, s. v.

Stick-Insect, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects, of the family Phasmidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1754. "The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animated Stalk, of which there are different kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass . . ."—Ives, p. 20.

1860. "The Stick-insect.—The Phasmidae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congeners do to green leaves. . . ."—Emerson-Tennent, Ceylon, i. 252.

Stink-wood, s. Foetidia Mauriti-ana, Lam., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant. "At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stink-wood into the pockets of respectable persons."—Birdwood (MS.).

Stridhana, Streedhana, s. Skt. stri-dhana, 'women's property.' A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises.

1875. "The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhan,"—Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

Stupa. See Tope.

Sucker-Bucker, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sakhar on the right bank of the Indus, and the island-fortress of Bakkar or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Roree-Bucker; from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkar, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Arör or Alör, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed.

c. 1333. "I passed 5 days at Lähari . . . and quitted it to proceed to Bakär. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 114-115.

1521. Shah Beg "then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after several days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Sakhar."—Turkhān Nāma, in Elliot, i. 311.

1554. "After a thousand sufferings we arrived at the end of some days' journey, at Siāwan (Schwan), and then, passing by Patara and Darilja, we entered the fortress of Bakr."—Sidi 'Alī, p. 136.

1616. "Buckor, the Chiefe Citie, is called Buckor succor."—Terry.

Sucket, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweetmeats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean loaf-sugar?

1584. "White sucket from Zindi" (i.e. Sind) "Cambaia, and China."—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

c. 1620-30.

" . . . . . For this, This Candy wine, three merchants were undone;

These suckets brake as many more."

Beaumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer, i. 1.

Suclát, Sackcloth, etc., s. Pers. saḳallāt, or saḳallaṭ, saḳlātīn, saḳlātūm, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broad-cloth. It is sometimes defined as scarlet broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. It has, however, been supposed that our word scarlet comes from some form of the present word (see Skeat, s.v. Scarlet).*

c. 1665. " . . . they laid them out, partly in fine Cotton Cloth . . . partly in Silken Stuffs

But the fact that the Arab. dictionaries give a form sakīrlāt must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, probably taken from the European word.

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form siclatoun, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 58, notes). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. ṣakl, 'polishing' (see Sicligur); from Sicily (Ar. Ṣikiliya); and from the Latin cyclas, cycladatus. In the Arabic Vocabulista of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), siklatūn is translated by ciclas. The conclusion come to in the note on Marco Polo, based, partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of sakallāt, was that saklatūn was probably a light woollen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as étouffe de soie, brochée d'or, and the passage from Edrisi supports this undoubtedly.

To the north of India the name suklāt is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1040. "The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of saklatūn of various colours. . . ."—Baihaqi, in Elliot, ii. 148.

c. 1150. Almeria (Almaria) was a Muslim city at the time of the Moravidae. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 800 silk looms, where they manufactured costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as Saklatūn Is-fahānī . . . and various other silk tissues."—Edrisi (Joubert), ii. 40.

c. 1220. "Tabriz. The chief city of Azarbaijān. . . They make there "the stuffs called 'attābi (see Tabby), Siklatūn, Khitābi, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere."—Yāqūt, in Barbier de Meynard, i. 133.

BROADCLOTH (Europe), ('Suklat, 'Mahoot')—Id. App. p. cexxx.

Sudder death. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, the standing dish at a dawki-bungalow in former days. The bird was caught in the yard, as the traveller entered, and was on the table by the time he had bathed and dressed.

Sudder, adj., but used as s. Literally 'chief,' being Ar. ṣadr. This term had a technical application under Mahomedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted in a footnote.* The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

(a.) Sudder Board. This is the 'Board of Revenue,' of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called 'Sudder Board' there.

(b.) Sudder Court, i.e. 'Sudder Adawlat (ṣadr 'adālat). This was till 1862, in Calcutta and in the N. W. P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister-Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled The High Court of Judiciary. A similar Court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N. W. P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen

* c. 1840. "The Ṣadr-jihān ('Chief of the World') i.e. the Kadi-al-Qudāt ('Judge of Judges') . . . possesses ten townships, producing a revenue of about 60,000 tankas. He is also called Ṣadr-al-Islām."—Shihabuddin Dimishki, in Notice et Extraits, xiii. 185.

(q.v.) This was the designation of the second rank of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native Judge was Principal Sudder Ameen; the 2nd rank, Sudder Ameen; the 3rd, Moonsiff. In the new classification there are in Bengal Subordinate Judges of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd grade, and Munsiffs (see Moonsiff) of 4 grades; in Bombay, Subordinate Judges of the 1st class in 3 grades, and 2nd class in 4 grades; and in Madras Subordinate Judges in 3 grades, and Munsiffs in 4 grades.

(d.) Sudder Station. The chief station of a district, viz., that where the Collector, Judge, and other chief civil officials reside, and where their Courts are.

Sugar, s. This familiar word is of Sanskrit origin. Sarkara originally signifies 'grit or gravel,' thence crystallized sugar, and through a Prakrit form salkkara gave the Persian shakkar, the Greek σάκχαρ and σάκχαρον, and the late Latin succharum. The Arabic is sukkar, or with the article as-sukkar, and it is probable that our modern forms, It. zucchero and succhero, Fr. sucre, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came, as well as the Span. azúcar and Port. assucar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek.* In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugarcane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see Jaggery) is a much older product than that of the cane. The original habitat of the latter is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words "habitat et colitur"—which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending from Cochin-China to Bengal.

Though, as we have said, the knowledge which the ancients had of sugar was very dim, we are disposed greatly to question the thesis, which has been so confidently maintained by Salmassius and later writers, that the original saccharon of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboos, and used in medieval medicine under the name of tabashir (q.v.). It is just possible that Pliny, in the passage quoted below, may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White's Latin Dictionary we read that by the word saccharon is meant (not sugar but) "a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo." This is nonsense.* There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabashir at all sweet.† It could never have been called "honey" (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. All the erroneous notices of σάκχαρον seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what-not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallized products of the sugarcane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a syrup or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shi-mi or 'stone-

* There is a statement of this kind in Pico's Mantissa Aromatica, 1658, p. 186. But we never did hear of any fact, nor can we now, to justify the statement. Pico does not appear to have been in the tropics himself.

† In fact, since this was written we have seen and tasted genuine tabashir, or siliceous deposit in bamboo. It is slightly bitter and physicky in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica.

honey' as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of Taitsung (627—650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chinī (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Misri, or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; loaf-sugar is called kand.

"Loaf sugars are of several sorts, viz. zucchero mucchera, caffettino, and bambillonìa; and musciatto, and dommashino; and the mucchera is the best sugar there is; for it is more thoroughly boiled, and its paste is whiter, and more solid, than any other sugar; it is in the form of the bambillonìa sugar like this Δ; and of this mucchera kind but little comes to the west, because nearly the whole is kept for the mouth and for the use of the Soldan himself.

"Zucchero caffettino is the next best after the mucchera . . .

(and a great deal more).—Pegolotti, 362-365.

We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bambillonìa is 'Sugar of Babylon', i.e. of Cairo, and Dommaschino of Damascus. Mucchera, * Caffettino, and Musciatto, no doubt all represent Arabic terms used in the trade at Alexandria, but we cannot identify them.

1810. "Although the sugar cane is supposed by many to be indigenous in India, yet it has only been within the last 50 years that it has been cultivated to any great extent... Strange to say, the only sugar-candy used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; & latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 133.

Sultan, s. Arab. sultān, a Prince, a Monarch. But this concrete sense is, in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.' The corresponding words in Hebrew and Aramaic have, as usual, sh or s. Thus Sultān in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingdom")—is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sultān in its post-classical sense, is shalūt, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xlii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yūsuf Salāh-ad-dīn) was not the first Joseph who was sultan of Egypt.

Sumatra, n. p. This name has been applied to the great island since about A.D. 1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have originated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Samudra, was certainly not far from Paei, the Pacem of the early Portuguese writers, the Passir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 276 segg.).

Since the preceding sentences were written we have read, in a valuable Dutch periodical, that in 1881 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Paei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Paei), came upon a kampung, or village, called Samudra.*

* Letter from C. W. J. Wenniker, in Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volkenkunde van Nederlandsch Indie, ser. iv. vol. 6 (1882), p. 298.

We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name is probably to be recognized in Samara, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this coast, intervening between Basma, or Pacem, and Dagroian or Dragoian, which last seems to correspond with Pedir. This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that it has disappeared accidentally from Polo's Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the etymology of the name, and others have been suggested; but in all probability it was the Skt. Samudra, the 'sea.' At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwāra Samudra in S. India (see Dora Samoender).

The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumutala. The chief of this state is called in the Chinese record Tu-han-pa-ti (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 605), which seems exactly to represent the Malay words Tuan-Pati, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumutra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lamori had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Lāmbri, which was then the state and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolo Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shamuthera. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Siamotra or Taprobane. The confusion with Taprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading state upon the coast, and certainly no state known as Samudra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Āin, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognize the existence of a place called Samudra or Samotdara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achin, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamsuddin Shamatrānī, which seems to point to a place called Shamatra as his birth-place. And a distinct mention of "the island of Samatra" as named from "a city of this northern part" occurs in the soi-disant "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malacca" in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbosa. This man, on leaving Pedir and going down the coast, says: 'I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatra,' and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be, mere plunder from Varthema.*

There is however a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502), and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island." (See in De Gubernatis, Viagg. Ital. 391.)

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining states of Pasei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send to one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantala). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Pasei, and very near where Pasei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account "of about A.D. 1413" accompanied the map.

* Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way. For there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Tulu-manghin (qu. Telu-Samawe?). A curious passage also will be found below extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Bijdragen).

c. 1346. "... after a voyage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jāwa" (i.e. the Java Minor of Marco Polo, or Sumatra) "... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say into the city of Sumuthra. It is large and handsome, and is encompassed with a wall and towers of timber."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 228-230.

1416. "SUMATRA [Su-men-ta-la]. This country is situated on the great road of western trade. When a ship leaves Malacca for the west, and goes with a fair eastern wind for five days and nights, it first comes to a village on the sea-coast called Ta-lu-man; anchoring here and going south-east for about 10 li (3 miles) one arrives at the said place.

"This country has no walled city. There is a large brook running out into the sea, with two tides every day; the waves at the mouth of it are very high, and ships continually founder there..."—Chinese work, quoted by Groeneveldt, p. 85.

Sumatra, s. Sudden squalls, precisely such as are described by Lockyer and the others below, and which are common in the narrow sea between the Malay Peninsula and the island of Sumatra, are called by this name.

1616. "... it befel that the galliot of Miguel de Macedo was lost on the Ilha Grande of Malacca (?), where he had come to anchor, when a Samatra arose that drove him on the island, the vessel going to pieces, though the crew and most part of what she carried were saved."—Bocarro, Decada, 626.

1711. "Frequent squalls. . . these are often accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, and continue very fierce for Half an Hour, more or less. Our English Sailors call them Sumatras, because they always meet with them on the Coasts of this Island."—Lockyer, 56.

1726. "At Malacca the streights are not above 4 Leagues broad; for though the opposite shore on Sumatra is very low, yet it may easily be seen on a clear Day, which is the Reason that the Sea is always as smooth as a Mill-pond, except it is ruffled with Squalls of Wind, which seldom come without Lightning, Thunder, and Rain, and though they come with great Violence, yet they are soon over, not often exceeding an Hour."—A. Ham. ii. 79.

1843. "Sumatras, or squalls from the S. Westward, are often experienced in the S.W. Monsoon. . . Sumatras generally come off the land during the first part of the night, and are sometimes sudden and severe, accompanied with loud thunder, lightning, and rain."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 215.

Sunda, n. p. The western and most mountainous part of the Island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manners, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country. The Dutch call them Sundanese (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e., embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java. Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in "Java," a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island.

From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor "the Sunda Islands."

1516. "And having passed Samatara towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is much good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China."—Barbosa, 196.

1526. "Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeot and a foist, went into the port of Qunda, which is at the end of the island of Qamatra, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandize exported thence. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them."—Correa, iii. 92.

1553. "Of the land of Jaua we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. . . . But the Jaos themselves do not reckon two islands of Jaoa, but one only, of the length that has been stated . . . about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak. The natives of that part consider their country to be an island divided from Jaua by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Chiamo or Chenano, which cuts off right from the sea,* all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Jaua they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Chiamo, and on the east by the island of Bale, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea." . . . etc.—Barros, IV. i. 12.

1554. "The information we have of this port of Calapa, which is the same as Qunda, and of another port called Bocaa, these two being 15 leagues one from the other, and both under one King, is to the effect that the supply of pepper one year with another will be xxx thousand quintals,† that is to say, xx thousand in one year, and x thousand the next year; also that it is very good pepper, as good as that of Malauar, and it is purchased with cloths of Cambaya, Bengalla, and Choromandel."—A. Nunez, in Subsidios, 42.

1566. "Sonda, vn Isola de' Mori appresso la costa della Giava."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391v.

"Os Sundas e *Malaio*s com pimenta, Com massa, e noz os ricos Bandanezes, Com roupa e droga Cambaia a opulenta, E com cravo os longinquos Maluguezes." Ant. de Abreu, Desc. de Malacca.

1598. Linschoten does not recognize the two islands. To him Sunda is only a place in Java:—

* " . . . hum rio . . . que corta do mar todo aquele tergo de terra." . . . We are not quite sure how to translate. Crawford renders: "This (river) intersects the whole island from sea to sea," which seems very free. But it is true, as we have said, that several old maps show Java and Sunda thus divided from sea to sea.

† Apparently 30,000 quintals every two years.

"... there is a straight or narrow passage between Sumatra and Iaua, called the straight of Sunda, of a place so called, lying not far from thence within the Ile of Iaua. . . . The principall haven in the lland is Sunda Calapa,* whereof the straight beareth the name; in this place of Sûda there is much Pepper."—p. 34.

Sunderbunds, n. p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hoogly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) on the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain. Sundaru-vana ('beautiful forest'); Sundari-vana, or -ban ('Forest of the Sundari tree'); Chandra-ban, and Chandra-band ('Moon-Forest' or 'Moon-Embankment'); Chanda-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers;† Chandra-dip-ban from a large zemindary called Chandra-dip in the Bakerganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundari. The name has never been in English mouths, or in English popular orthography, Soonderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sandra or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Broucke's map (1660) which was published in Valentijn's East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hoogly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Basanderi, located near the exit into the Hoogly of what represents the old Saraswati River, which enters the former at Sankral, not far below the Botanical Gardens and 5 or 6 miles below Fort William. This has led Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sanderi Bosch with the old Mahall Basandhari which appears in the Āin as belonging to the Sirkār of Sulmānābād (Gladwin's Ayeen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Blochm. in J.A.S.B. xlii. pt. i. p. 232), and which formed one of the original "xxiv. Pergunnas."* Undoubtedly this is the Basanderi of V. den Broucke's map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Basanderi and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sandurban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to misplace the latter. We should gather from Schulz† that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankral (which he mentions). But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we apprehend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 169).

1661. "We got under sail again" (just after meeting with Arakan pirates) "in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonia."—Walter Schulz, 155.

c. 1666. "And thence it is" (from piratical raids of the Mugs, etc.) "that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine Isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other Inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Tygers."—Bernier, E. T. 54.

1726. "This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sulthwan Iskender, and in their histories Iskender Doulcarnain, was . . . they can show you the exact place where King Porus held his court. The natives will prate much of this matter; for example, that in front of the SANDERIE-WOOD (Sanderie Bosch, which we show in the map, and which they call properly after

† These are mentioned in a copper tablet inscription of A.D. 1136; see Blochmann, as quoted further on, p. 226.

* Basandhari is also mentioned by Mr. James Grant (1789) in his View of the Revenues of Bengal, as the Pergunna of Balia-bussendry; and by A. Hamilton as a place on the Damdiar, producing much good sugar (Fifth Report, p. 405; A. Ham. ii. 4). It would seem to have been the present Pergunna of Balia, some 13 or 14 miles west of the northern part of Calcutta. See Hunter's Bengal Gaz. i. 365.

In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from "Soondery wood," and "Soonder-ban," 'beautiful wood,' and proceeds: "But we adhere to our own etymology rather . . . above all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprized in the ancient Zemindarry pergunnah of Chunder deep, or lunar territory."

1835. "The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them 'cintra.'"—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 99.

Sunn, s. Beng. and Hind. san, from Skt. śana; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N. O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp. It is of course in no way kindred to true hemp, except in its economic use.

Sunyásee, s. Skt. sannyāsi, lit. 'one who resigns, or abandons,' scil. 'worldly affairs;' a Hindū religious mendicant.

The name of Sunnyassee was applied familiarly in Bengal, c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himālaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kāsim 'Alī (1760-61) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1766 the great geographer James Rennell, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch Bihār (see Cooch), was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

I came up with Morrison immediately after he had defeated the Sanashys in a pitched Battle . . . Our Escorte, which were a few Horse, rode off, and the Enemy with drawn Sabres immediately surrounded us. Morrison escaped unhurt, Richards, my Brother officer, received only a slight Wound, and fought his Way off; my Armenian Assistant was killed, and the Sepoy Adjutant much wounded . . . I was put in a Palankeen, and Morrison made an attack on the Enemy and cut most of them to Pieces. I was now in a most shocking Condition indeed, being deprived of the Use of both my Arms, . . . a cut of a Sable (sic) had cut through my right Shoulder Bone, and laid me open for nearly a Foot down the Back, cutting thro' and wounding some of my Ribs. Supāra, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of Western India, in Skt. Sārpāraka,* popularly Supāra. It was near Wasāi (Baṇaim of the Portuguese, —see (1) Bassein, —which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahābhārat as a very holy place, and in other old * Williams (Skt. Dict., s.v.) gives Sārpāraka as "the name of a mythical country;" but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Sārpāraka on the coast of Orissa, Σαρπάρα of Ptolemy.

Some Arab writers called it the Sofala of India.

Sura, s. = 'Toddy' (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild-date. It is the Skt. surā, 'vinous liquor,' which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity,* applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies surā in the same way. Bluteau, curiously, calls this a Caffre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit., iv. 293).

Surat, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accented Suratt; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Sūrāt.* Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahomedan kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Saurāshtra was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently spelt and pronounced Sorath (see next article). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus :

"The names 'Surat' and 'Sorath' are identical, both being derived from the Sanskrit Surāshtra; but as they belong to different places a distinction in spelling has been maintained. 'Surat' is the city; 'Sorath' is a prānt or district of Kattiwar, of which Junāgarh is the chief town."—Elliot, v. 350 (see also p. 197).

Also :

"The Sanskrit Surāshtra and Gurjara survive in the modern names Surat and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Surāshtra nor Guzerat in Gurjjara. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolemy's Surastrene comprises Surat . . ."—Dowson (?), in Id. i. 359.

This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolemy's Ἀράκη, not in Συραστρηνή, which represents, like Saurāshtra, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connexion between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Saurāshtra or Sorath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only came to notice as a place of any importance about the very end of the 15th century, when a rich Hindu trader, Gopi by name, is stated to have established himself on the spot, and founded the town. The way, however, in which it is spoken of by Barbosa previous to 1516 shows that the rise of its prosperity may have been rapid.

1510. "Don Afonso" (de Noronha, nephew of Albuquerque) "in the storm not knowing whither they went, entered the Gulf of Cambay, and struck upon a shoal in front of Qurrate. Trying to save themselves by swimming or on planks many perished, and among them Don Afonso."—Correa, ii. 29.

1516. "Having passed beyond the river of Reynel, on the other side there is a city which they call Qurate, peopled by Moors, and close upon the river; they deal there in many kinds of wares, and carry on a great trade; for many ships of Malabar and other parts sail thither, and sell what they bring, and return loaded with what they choose . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 280.

1525. "The corjaa (see Corge) of cotton cloths of Qurate, of 14 yards each, is worth . . . 250 fedeas."—Lembrança, 45.

1528. "Heytor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Qurrate and Reynel, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison . . ."—Correa, iii. 277.

1553. "Thence he proceeded to the bāṛ of the river Tapti, above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat, 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Reiner, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank . . . The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilization, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from this city that most of the foists and ships of the King of Cambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Banyans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths."—Barros, IV. iv. 8.

1554. "So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surat."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 83.

1573. "Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress . . . During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaimānī, from the name of Sulaimān Sultān of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarāt, he sent these . . . with a large army by sea. As the Turks . . . were obliged to return, they left these mortars . . . The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudāwand Khān built the fortress of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Sŭrath (see next article) was taken to the fort of Junāgarh by the ruler of that country."—Ṭabakāt-i-Akbarī, in Elliot, v. 350.

c. 1590. "Sŭrat is among famous ports. The river Tapti runs hard by, and at seven coss distance joins the salt sea. Rānir on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Sŭrat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khandevī and Balsār are also annexed to Sŭrat. Fruit, and especially the ananās, is abundant . . . The sectaries of Zardasht, emigrant from Fārs, have made their dwelling here; they revere the Zhand and Fazhand and erect their dakhmas (or places for exposing the dead) . . . Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commandants of the troops (Sipah-salārān), a considerable tract of this Sŭrkār is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g. Daman, Sanjān (see St. John's), Tārāpūr, Māhim, and Basai (see (1) Bassein), that are both cities and ports."—Ā'in (orig.), i. 488.

1638. "Within a League of the Road we entred into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indrans are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapti . . . is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 80 Tun can hardly come into it."—Mandelsto, p. 12.

1690. "Suratt is reckon'd the most fam'd Emporium of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible . . . And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Hoys and Yachts, and Country Boats."—Ovington, 218.

Sŭrath, more properly Sōrath, and Sōreth, n.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Saurāshtra and Greek Syrrastrēnē, names which applied to what we now call the Kattywar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the seacoast. The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Asōka (B.C. 250) on a rock at Girnār, near Junāgarh in Saurāshtra, shows that the dominion of that great sovereign, whose capital was at Patāliputra (Παλιπύθηρα) or Patna, extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sŭrath or Sōrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prāntas or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prāntas containing a number of small states, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sorath occupies the southwestern portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles.

Surkunda, s. Hind. sar-kandû. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Saccharum Sura, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Saccharum procerum, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a howda on the back of a tall elephant. It is from the upper part of the flower-bearing stalk of surkunda that sirky (q.v.) is derived. A most intelligent visitor to India was led into a curious mistake about the name of this grass by some official, who ought to have known better. We quote the passage. —'s story about the main branch of a river channel probably rests on no better foundation.

1875. "As I drove yesterday with —, I asked him if he knew the scientific name of the tall grass which I heard called tiger-grass at Ahmedabad, and which is very abundant here (about Lahore). I think it is a saccharum, but am not quite sure. 'No,' he said, 'but the people in the neighbourhood call it Sikunder's grass, as they still call the main branch of a river 'Sikander's channel.' Strange, is it not?—how that great individuality looms through history."—Grant Duff, Notes of an Indian Journey, 105.

Surpoose, s. Pers. sar-posh ('head-cover'); a cover, as of a basin, dish, hooka-bowl, &c.

1829. "Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam and surpoose."—John Shipp, ii. 159.

Surrapurda, s. Pers. sarâparda. A canvas screen surrounding royal tents or the like (see Conaut).

1404. And there was a gateway of great height forming an arch, with doors within and without made in the same fashion as the wall . . . and above the gateway a square tower with battlements: however fine the said wall was with its many devices and artifices, the said gateway, arch and tower, was of much more exquisite work still. Surrinjaum, s. Pers. sar-anjâm, lit. 'beginning-ending.' Used in India for 'apparatus,' 'goods and chattels,' and the like. But in the Mahratta provinces it has a special application to grants of land, or rather assignments of revenue, for special objects, such as keeping up a contingent of troops for service; to civil officers for the maintenance of their state; or for charitable purposes.

Suttee, s. The rite of widow-burning; i.e. the burning the living widow along with the corpse of her husband, as practised by people of certain castes among the Hindus, and eminently by the Rājputs.

The word is properly Skt. satī, 'a good woman,' 'a true wife,' and thence specially applied, in modern vernaculars of Sanskrit parentage, to the wife who was considered to accomplish the supreme act of fidelity by sacrificing herself on the funeral pile of her husband. The application of this substantive to the suicidal act, instead of the person, is European. The proper Sanskrit term for the act is saha-gamana or 'keeping company.* A very long series of quotations in illustration of the practice, from classical times downwards, might be given. We shall present a selection.

We should remark that the word (satī or suttee) does not occur, so far as we know, in any European work older than the 17th century. And then it only occurs in a disguised form (see quotation from P. della Valle). The term masti which he uses is probably mahā-satī, which occurs in Skt. Dictionaries ('a wife of great virtue'). Della Valle is usually eminent in the correctness of his transcriptions of oriental words. We have not found the term exactly in any European document older than Sir C. Malet's letter of 1787, and Sir W. Jones's of the same year (see below).

Suttee is a brahmanical rite, and there is a Sanskrit ritual in existence (see Classified Index to the Tanjore MSS., p. 135a). It was introduced into Southern India by the brahman civilisation, and was prevalent there chiefly in the strictly brahmanical Kingdom of Vijayanagar, and among the Maharrattas. In Malabar, the most primitive part of S. India, the rite is forbidden (Anāchārunirṇaya, v. 26). The cases mentioned by Teixeira below, and in the Lettres Édifiantes, occurred at Tanjore and Madura.

A (Maharratta) brahman at Tanjore told one of the present writers that he had to perform commemorative funeral rites for his grandfather and grandmother on the same day, and that this indicated that his grandmother had been a sati.

The practice has prevailed in various regions besides India. Thus it seems to have been an early custom among the heathen Russians, or at least among nations on the Volga called Russians by Mas'udi and Ibn Fozlān. Herodotus (Bk. v. ch. 5) describes it among certain tribes of Thracians. It was in vogue in Tonga and the Fiji Islands. It has prevailed in the island of Bali within our own time, though there accompanying Hindu rites, and perhaps of Hindu origin,—certainly modified by Hindu influence. A full account of Suttee as practised in those Malay Islands where Islam has not prevailed will be found in Zollinger's account of the Religion of Sassak in J. Ind. Arch. ii. 166; also see Friedrich's Bali as in note preceding.

In Diodorus we have a long account of the rivalry as to which of the two wives of Kēteus, a leader of an Indian contingent in the army of Eumenes, should perform suttee. One is rejected as with child. The history of the other terminates thus:

B.C. 317. "Finally, having taken leave of those of the household, she was set upon the pyre by her own brother, and was regarded with wonder by the crowd that had run together to the spectacle, and heroically ended her life; the whole force with their arms thrice marching round the pyre before it was kindled. But she, laying herself beside her husband, and even at the violence of the flame giving utterance to no unbecoming cry, stirred pity indeed in others of the spectators, and in some excess of eulogy; not but what there were some of the Greeks present who reproached such rites as barbarous and cruel. . . ."—Diod. Sic. Biblioth., xix. 33-34.

C. B.C. 30.
"Felix Eois lex funeris una maritis
Quos Aurora suis rubra colorat equis; Namque ubi mortifero jacta est fax ultima
lecto
Uxorū fūsis stat pia turba comis;
Et certamen habet leti, quae viva sequatur
Conjugium; pudor est non licuisse mori.
Ardent victrices; et flammae pectora
praebent,
Imponuntque suis ora perusta viris."
Propertius, * Lib. iii. xiii. 15-22.

C. B.C. 20. "He (Aristobulus) says that he had heard from some persons of wives burning themselves voluntarily with their deceased husbands, and that those women who refused to submit to this custom were

* But it is worthy of note that in the Island of Bali one manner of accomplishing the rite is called Satia (Skt. satya, 'truth,' from sat, whence also satī). See Crawford, H. of Ind. Archip. ii. 248, and Friedrich, in Verhandelungen van het Batav. Genootschap. xxiii. 10.

* The same poet speaks of Evadne, who threw herself at Thebes on the burning pile of her husband Capaneus (l. xv. 21), a story which Paley thinks must have come from some early Indian legend.

disgraced."—Strabo, xv. 62 (E. T. by Hamilton and Falconer, iii. 112).

A.D. c. 390. "Indi, ut omnes fere barbari uxores plurimas habent. Apud eos lex est, ut uxor carissima cum defuncto marito cremetur. Hæc igitur contendunt inter se de amore viri, et ambitio summa certantium est, ac testimonium castitatis, dignam morte decerni. Itaque victrix in habitu ornatuque pristino juxta cadaver accubat, amplexans illud et deosculans et suppositos ignes prudentiæ laude contemnens."—St. Jerome, Advers. Jovinianum, in ed. Vallars, ii. 311.

c. 851. "All the Indians burn their dead. Serendib is the furthest out of the islands dependant upon India. Sometimes when they burn the body of a King, his wives cast themselves on the pile, and burn with him; but it is at their choice to abstain."—Reinaud, Relation, &c., i. 50.

c. 1200. "Hearing the Raja was dead, the Parmâri became a sati :—dying she said—The son of the Jadavani will rule the country, may my blessing be on him!"—Chand Bardai, in Ind. Ant. i. 227.*

1298. "Many of the women also, when their husbands die and are placed on the pile to be burnt, do burn themselves along with the bodies."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1322. "The idolaters of this realm have one detestable custom (that I must mention). For when any man dies they burn him; and if he leave a wife they burn her alive with him, saying that she ought to go and keep her husband company in the other world. But if the woman have sons by her husband she may abide with them, as she will."—Odoric, in Cathay, i. 79.

Also in Zampa or Champa: "When a married man dies in this country his body is burned, and his living wife along with it. For they say that she should go to keep company with her husband in the other world also."—Ibid. 97.

c. 1328. "In this India, on the death of a noble, or of any people of substance, their bodies are burned; and eke their wives follow them alive to the fire, and for the sake of worldly glory, and for the love of their husbands, and for eternal life, burn along with them, with as much joy as if they were going to be wedded. And those who do this have the higher repute for virtue and perfection among the rest."—Fr. Jordanus, 20.

c. 1343. "The burning of the wife after the death of her husband is an act among the Indians recommended, but not obligatory. If a widow burns herself, the members of the family get the glory thereof, and the fame of fidelity in fulfilling their duties. She who does not give herself up to the flames puts on coarse raiment and abides with her kindred, wretched and despised for having failed in duty. But she is not compelled to burn herself." (There follows an interesting account of instances witnessed by the traveller.)—Ibn Batuta, ii. 138.

c. 1430. "In Mediâ vero Indiâ mortui comburantur, cumque his, ut plurimum vivae uxores . . . una pluresve, prout fuit matrimonii conventio. Prior ex lege uritur, etiam quæ unica est. Sumuntur autem et aliae uxores quædam eo pacto, ut morte funus suâ exornent, isque haud parvus apud eos honos ducitur . . . submisso igne uxor ornatiori cultu inter tubas tibicinasque et cantus, et ipsa psallentis more alacris rogum magno comitatu circuit. Adstat interea et sacerdos . . . hortando suadens. Cum circumierit illa sæpius ignem prope suggestum consistit, vestesque exuens, loto de more prius corpore, tum sindonem albam induta, ad exhortationem dicentis in ignem prosilit."—N. Conti, in Poggius de Varietate Fortunæ, iv.

c. 1520. There are in this Kingdom (the Deccan) many heathen, natives of the country, whose custom it is that when they die they are burnt, and their wives along with them; and if these will not do it they remain in disgrace with all their kindred. And as it happens oft times that they are unwilling to do it, their Bramin kinsfolk persuade them thereto, and this in order that such a fine custom should not be broken and fall into oblivion."—Sommario de Genti, in Ramusio, i. f. 329.

"In this country of Camboja . . . when the King dies, the lords voluntarily burn themselves, and so do the King's wives at the same time, and so also do other women on the death of their husbands."—Ibid. f. 336.

1522. "They told us that in Java Major it was the custom, when one of the chief men died, to burn his body; and then his principal wife, adorned with garlands of flowers, has herself carried in a chair by four men . . . comforting her relations, who are afflicted because she is going to burn herself with the corpse of her husband . . . saying to them, 'I am going this evening to sup with my dear husband and to sleep with him this night.' . . . After again consoling them (she) casts herself into the fire and is burned. If she did not do this she would not be looked upon as an honourable woman, nor as a faithful wife."—Pigafetta, E. T. by Lord Stanley of A., 154.

c. 1566. Cesare Federici notices the rite as peculiar to the Kingdom of "Ecenegger:" "vidi cose stranie e bestiali di quella gentilità; vsano primamente abbruciare i corpi morti così d'huomini come di donne nobili; e si l'huomo è maritato, la moglie è obligata ad abbruciarsi viva col corpo del marito."—Orig. ed. p. 36.

This traveller gives a good account of a Sutee.

1583. "In the interior of Hindústân it is the custom when a husband dies, for his widow willingly and cheerfully to cast herself into the flames (of the funeral pile), although she may not have lived happily with him.

* We cannot be sure that sati is in the original, as this is a condensed version by Mr. Beames.

Occasionally love of life holds her back, and then her husband's relations assemble, light the pile, and place her upon it, thinking that they thereby preserve the honour and character of the family. But since the country had come under the rule of his gracious Majesty [Akbar], inspectors had been appointed in every city and district, who were to watch carefully over these two cases, to discriminate between them, and to prevent any woman being forcibly burnt."—Abul Fazl, Akbar Nāmah, in Elliot, vi. 69.

1583. "Among other sights I saw one I may note as wonderful. When I landed (at Negapatam) from the vessel, I saw a pit full of kindled charcoal; and at that moment a young and beautiful woman was brought by her people on a litter, with a great company of other women, friends of hers, with great festivity, she holding a mirror in her left hand, and a lemon in her right hand . . ." and so forth.—G. Balbi, i. 82v, 83.

1586. "The custom of the countrey (Java) is, that whensoever the King doeth die, they take the body so dead and burne it, and preserve the ashes of him, and within five dayes next after, the wives of the said King so dead, according to the custome and vse of their countrey, every one of them goe together to a place appointed, and the chiefe of the women which was nearest to him in accompt, hath a ball in her hand, and throweth it from her, and the place where the ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turne their faces to the Eastward, and every one with a dagger in their hand (which dagger they call a erise, and is as sharpe as a rasor), stab themselves in their owne blood, and fall a-groveling on their faces, and so endeth their dayes."—T. Candish, in Hakluyt, iv. 338.

This passage refers to Blambangan at the east end of Java, which till a late date was subject to Bali, in which such practices have continued to our day. It seems probable that the Hindu rite here came in contact with the old Polynesian practices of a like kind, which prevailed e.g. in Fiji, quite recently. The narrative referred to below under 1633, where the victims were the slaves of a deceased queen, points to the latter origin.

W. Humboldt thus alludes to similar passages in old Javanese literature :

"Thus we may reckon as one of the finest episodes in the Brata Yuda, the story how Satya Wati, when she had sought out her slain husband among the wide-spread heap of corpses on the battle-field, stabs herself by his side with a dagger."—Kawi-Sprache, i. 89 (and see the whole section, pp. 87-95).

1598. The usual account is given in Linschoten, ch. xxxvi., with a plate.

1611. "When I was in India, on the death of the Naigue of Maduré, a country situated between that of Malauar and that of Choromandel, 400 wives of his burned themselves along with him."—Teipectra, i. 9.

c. 1620. "The author . . . when in the territory of the Karnátik . . . arrived in company with his father at the city of Southern Mathura (Madura), where, after a few days, the ruler died and went to hell. The chief had 700 wives, and they all threw themselves at the same time into the fire."—Muhammed Sharif Hanafi, in Elliot, vii. 139.

1623. "When I asked further if force was ever used in these cases, they told me that usually it was not so, but only at times among persons of quality when some one had left a young and handsome widow, and there was a risk either of her desiring to marry again (which they consider a great scandal) or of worse mishap,—in such a case the relations of the husband, if they were very strict, would compel her, even against her will, to burn . . . a barbarous and cruel law indeed ! But in short, as regarded Giacamà, no one exercised either compulsion or persuasion ; and she did the thing of her own free choice ; both her kindred and herself exulting in it, as in an act magnanimous (which in sooth it was) and held in high honour among them. And when I asked about the ornaments and flowers that she wore, they told me this was customary as a sign of the joyousness of the Masti (Masti is what they call a woman who gives herself to be burnt upon the death of her husband)."—P. della Valle, ii. 671.

1633. "The same day, about noon, the queen's body was burnt without the city, with two and twenty of her female slaves ; and we consider ourselves bound to render an exact account of the barbarous ceremonies practised in this place on such occasions as we were witness to. . . ."—Narrative of a Dutch Mission to Bali, quoted by Crawford, H. of Ind. Arch., ii. 244-253, from Prevost. It is very interesting, but too long for extract.

c. 1650. "They say that when a woman becomes a Sattee, that is burns herself with the deceased, the Almighty pardons all the sins committed by the wife and husband and that they remain a long time in paradise : nay if the husband were in the infernal regions, the wife by this means draws him from thence and takes him to paradise . . . Moreover the Sattee, in a future birth, returns not to the female sex . . . but she who becomes not a Sattee, and passes her life in widowhood, is never emancipated from the female state . . . It is however criminal to force a woman into the fire, and equally to prevent her who voluntarily devotes herself."—Dabistān, ii. 75-76.

c. 1650-60. Tavernier gives a full account of the different manners of Suttee, which he had witnessed often, and in various parts of India, but does not use the word. We extract the following :

c. 1648. " . . . there fell of a sudden so violent a Shower, that the Priests, willing to get out of the Rain, thrust the Woman all along into the Fire. But the Shower was so vehement, and endured so long, that the Fire was quenched, and the Woman was not burn'd. About midnight she arose, and went and knock'd at one of her Kinsmen's Houses, where Father Zenon and many Hollanders saw her, looking so gastly and grimly, that it was enough to have scar'd them; however the pain she endur'd did not so far terrifie her, but that three days after, accompany'd by her Kindred, she went and was burn'd according to her first intention."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 84.

Again:

"In most places upon the Coast of Coromandel, the Women are not burnt with their deceas'd Husbands, but they are buried alive with them in holes, which the Bramins make a foot deeper than the tallness of the man and woman. Usually they chuse a Sandy place; so that when the man and woman are both let down together, all the Company with Baskets of Sand fill up the hole above half a foot higher than the surface of the ground, after which they jump and dance upon it, till they believe the woman to be stiff'd."—Id. 171.

c. 1667. Bernier also has several highly interesting pages on this subject, in his "Letter written to M. Chapelain, sent from Chiras in Persia." We extract a few sentences: "Concerning the Women that have actually burn'd themselves, I have so often been present at such dreadful spectacles, that at length I could endure no more to see it, and I retain still some horror when I think on't. . . . The Pile of Wood was presently all on fire, because store of Oyl and Butter had been thrown upon it, and I saw at the time through the Flames that the Fire took hold of the Cloaths of the Woman. . . . All this I saw, but observ'd not that the Woman was at all disturb'd; yea it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce with great force these two words, Five, Two, to signifie, according to the Opinion of those who hold the Souls Transmigration, that this was the 5th time she had burnt herself with the same Husband, and that there remain'd but two times for perfection; as if she had at that time this Remembrance, or some Prophetical Spirit."—English Version, p. 99.

1677. Suttee, described by A. Bassing, in Valentin v. (Ceylon) 300.

1727. "I have seen several burned several Ways. . . . I heard a Story of a Lady that had received Addresses from a Gentleman who afterwards deserted her, and her Relations died shortly after the Marriage. . . . and as the Fire was well kindled. . . . she espied her former Admirer, and beckned him to come to her. When he came she took him in her Arms, as if she had a Mind to embrace him; but being stronger than he, she carried him into the Flames in her Arms, where they were both consumed, with the Corpse of her Husband."—A. Ham. i. 278.

"The Country about (Calcutta) being overspread with Paganisms, the Custom of Wives burning themselves with their deceased Husbands, is also practised here. Before the Mogul's War, Mr. Channock went one time with his Ordinary Guard of Soldiers, to see a young Widow act that tragical Catastrophe, but he was so smitten with the Widow's Beauty, that he sent his Guards to take her by Force from her Executioners, and conducted her to his own Lodgings. They lived lovingly many Years, and had several Children; at length she died, after he had settled in Calcutta, but instead of converting her to Christianity, she made him a Proselyte to Paganism, and the only part of Christianity that was remarkable in him, was burying her decently, and he built a Tomb over her, where all his Life after her Death, he kept the anniversary Day of her Death by sacrificing a Cock on her Tomb, after the Pagan Manner."—Id. ii. 6-7.

1774. "Here (in Bali) not only women often kill themselves, or burn with their deceased husbands, but men also burn in honour of their deceased masters."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 170.

1787. "Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed the suttee (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed. . . ."—Sir C. Malet, in Parly. Papers of 1821, p. 1 ("Hindoo Widows").

"My Father, said he (Pundit Rhadacaunt), died at the age of one hundred years, and my mother, who was eighty years old, became a sati, and burned herself to expiate sins."—Letter of Sir Wm. Jones, in Life, ii. 120.

1792. "In the course of my endeavours I found the poor suttee had no relations at Poonah."—Letter from Sir C. Malet, in Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 394.

1808. "These proceedings (Hindu marriage ceremonies in Guzerat) take place in the presence of a Brahmin. . . . And farther, now the young woman vows that her affections shall be fixed upon her Lord alone, not only in all this life, but will follow in death, or to the next, that she will die, that she will burn with him, through as many transmigrations as shall secure their joint immortal bliss. Seven successions of suttees (a woman seven times born and burning, thus, as often) secure to the loving couple a seat among the gods."—R. Drummond.

"O sight of misery!

You cannot hear her cries . . . their sound In that wild dissonance is drowned; . . .

But in her face you see

The supplication and the agony . . . See in her swelling throat the desperate strength

That with vain effort struggles yet for life;

Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,

Now wildly at full length, Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread, . . .

They force her on, they bind her to the dead." Khama, i. 12.

In all the poem and its copious notes, the word suttee does not occur.

1828. "After having bathed in the river, the widow lighted a brand, walked round the pile, set it on fire, and then mounted cheerfully: the flame caught and blazed up instantly; she sat down, placing the head of the corpse on her lap, and repeated several times the usual form, 'Ram, Ram, Sutee; Ram, Ram, Sutee.'"—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 91-92.

1839. "Have you heard yet in England of the horrors that took place at the funeral of that wretched old Runjeet Singh? Four wives, and seven slave-girls were burnt with him; not a word of remonstrance from the British Government."—Letter from Madras, 278.

1843. "It is lamentable to think how long after our power was firmly established in Bengal, we, grossly neglecting the first and plainest duty of the civil magistrate, suffered the practices of infanticide and suttee to continue unchecked."—Macaulay's Speech on Gates of Somnath.

1856. "The pile of the suttee is unusually large; heavy cart-wheels are placed upon it, to which her limbs are bound, or sometimes a canopy of massive logs is raised above it, to crush her by its fall . . . It is a fatal omen to hear the Sutee's groan; therefore as the fire springs up from the pile, there rises simultaneously with it a deafening shout of 'Victory to Umbā! Victory to Ranchor!' and the horn and the hard rattling drum sound their loudest, until the sacrifice is consumed."—Rās Mālā, ii. 435.

1871. "Our bridal finery of dress and feast too often proves to be no better than the Hindu widow's 'bravery,' when she comes to perform suttee."—Cornhill Mag., vol. xxiv. 675.

1872. "La coutume du suicide de la Sati n'en est pas moins fort ancienne, puisque déjà les Grecs d'Alexandre la trouvèrent en usage chez un peuple au moins du Penjāb. Le premier témoignage brahmanique qu'on en trouve est celui de la Bṛihaddevatā qui, peut-être, remonte tout aussi haut. A l'origine elle paraît avoir été propre à l'aristocratie militaire."—Barth, Les Religions de l'Inde, 39.

Swallow, Swallow, s. The old trade-name of the sea-slug, or Tri-pang, q.v. It is a corruption of the Bugi (Makassar) name of the creature, suwālā (see Crawford's Malay Dict.).

1783. "I have been told by several Buggesses that they sail in their Paduakans to the northern parts of New Holland . . . to gather Swallow (Biche de Mer), which they sell to the annual China junk at Macassar."—Forrest, V. to Mergut, 83.

Swally, Swally Roads, Swally Marine, Swally Hole, n. p. Suwālā, the once familiar name of the roadstead north of the mouth of the Tapti, where ships for Surat usually anchored, and discharged or took in cargo. It was perhaps Arab. sawāḥil, 'the shores' (?)

1623. "At the beach there was no kind of vehicle to be found; so the Captain went on foot to a town about a mile distant called Sohali. . . The Franks have houses there for the goods which they continually despatch for embarkation."—P. della Valle, ii. 503.

1675. "As also passing by . . . eight ships riding at Surat River's Mouth, we then came to Swally Marine, where were flying the Colours of the Three Nations, English, French, and Dutch . . . who here land and ship off all Goods, without molestation."—Fryer, 82.

1677. "The 22d of February 1677 from Swally hole the Ship was despatched alone."—Id. 217.

1727. "One Season the English had eight good large Ships riding at Swally . . . The Place where all Goods were unloaded from the Shipping, and all Goods for Exportation were there shipp'd off."—A. Ham. i. 166.

1841. "These are sometimes called the inner and the outer sands of Swallow, and are both dry at low water."—Horsburgh's India Directory, ed. 1841, i. 474.

Swamy, Sammy, s. This word is a corruption of the Skt. suāmin, 'Lord.' It is especially used in South India, and in two senses: (a) A Hindu idol; especially, as Sammy, in the dialect of the British soldier. This comes from the usual Tamil pronunciation sāmi. (b) The Skt. word is used by Hindus as a term of respectful address.

a.

1755. "Towards the upper end there is a dark repository, where they keep their Swamme, that is their chief god."—Ives, 70.

1794. "The gold might for us as well have been worshipped in the shape of a Sawmy at Juggernaut."—The Indian Observer, p. 167.

1838. "The Government lately presented a shawl to a Hindu idol, and the Government officer . . . was ordered to superintend the delivery of it . . . so he went with the shawl in his tonjon, and told the Bramins that they might come and take it, for that he would not touch it with his fingers to present it to a Swamy."—Letters from Madras, 183.

b.

1516. "These people are commonly called Jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zoams, which means Servant of God."—Barbosa, 99.

1615. "Tunc ad suos conversus: Eia Brachmanes, inquit, quid vobis videtur? Illi mirabundi nihil praeter Suami, Suami, id est Domine, Domine, retulerunt."—Jarric, Thes. i. 664.

Swamy-house, Sammy-house, s. An idol-temple, or pagoda. The Sammy-house of the Delhi ridge in 1857 will not soon be forgotten.

1760. "The French cavalry were advancing before their infantry; and it was the intention of Colliand that his own should wait until they came in a line with the flank-fire of the field-pieces of the Swamy-house."—Orme, iii. 443.

1829. "Here too was a little detached Swamee-house (or chapel) with a lamp burning before a little idol."—Mem of Col. Mountain, 99.

1857. "We met Wilby at the advanced post, the 'Sammy House,' within 600 yards of the Bastion. It was a curious place for three brothers to meet in. The view was charming. Delhi is as green as an emerald just now, and the Jumna Musjid and Palace are beautiful objects, though held by infidels."—Letters written during the Siege of Delhi, by Hervey Greatheld, p. 112.

Swamy-pagoda, s. A coin formerly current at Madras; probably so-called from the figure of an idol on it. Milburn gives 100 swamy-pagodas = 110 Star Pagodas.

A "three swāmi pagoda" was a name given to a gold coin bearing on the obverse the effigy of Chenna Keswam Swāmi (a title of Krishna) and on the reverse Lakshmi and Rukmini. (C. P. B.)

Swatch, s. This is a marine term which probably has various applications beyond Indian limits. But the only two instances of its application that we know are both Indian, viz., "the Swatch of No Ground," or elliptically "The Swatch," marked in all the charts just off the Ganges Delta, and a space bearing the same name, and probably produced by analogous tidal action, off the Indus Delta.

1726. In Valentijn's first map of Bengal, though no name is applied there is a space marked "no ground with 60 raam (fathoms?) of line."

1863. (Ganges). "There is still one other phenomenon. . . . This is the existence of a great depression, or hole, in the middle of the Bay of Bengal, known in the charts as the 'Swatch of No Ground.'"—Fergusson, on Recent Changes in the Delta of the Ganges, Qy. Jour. Geol. Soc., Aug. 1863.

1877. (Indus). "This is the famous Swatch of no ground where the lead falls at once into 200 fathoms."—Burton, Sind Revisited, 21.

Sweet Oleander. This is in fact the common oleander, Nerium odorum, Ait.

1880. "Nothing is more charming than, even in the upland valleys of the Mahratta country, to come out of a wood of all outlandish trees and flowers suddenly on the dry winter bed of some mountain stream, grown along the banks, or on the little islets of verdure in mid (shingle) stream, with clumps of mixed tamarisk and lovely blooming oleander."—Birdwood, MS. 9.

Sweet Potato, s. The root of Batatas edulis, Choisy (Convolvulus Batatas, Linn.), N.O. Convolvulaceae; a very palatable vegetable, grown in most parts of India. Though extensively cultivated in America, and in the W. Indies, it has been alleged in various books (e.g. in Eng. Cyclop. Nat. Hist. Section, and in Drury's Useful Plants of India), that the plant is a native of the Malay Islands. The Eng. Cyc. even states that batatas is the Malay name. But the whole allegation is probably founded in error. The Malay names of the plant, as given by Crawford, are Kalelek, Ubi Jawa, and Ubi Kastila, the last two names meaning 'Java yam,' and 'Spanish yam,' and indicating the foreign origin of the vegetable. In India, at least in the Bengal Presidency, natives commonly call it shakar-kand (Pers. Arab.), literally 'sugar candy,' a name equally suggesting that it is not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement:

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spagnuola and in the others . . . and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a march-pane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. . . . When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one; for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit."—In Ramusio, iii. f. 134.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Kan-chu (the first syllable = 'sweet'). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-45), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l'origine américaine."

The "Sanskrit name" Ruktaloo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Ālū is properly an esculent Arum, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Raktālū, more commonly rat-ālū, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rakt- or rat-ālū means simply 'red potato'; a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan.

There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the potato, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of brazil-wood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the 'potato' of the fourth and others of the following quotations:

1519. "At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batate, pigne (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness. . . ."—Pigafetta, E. T. by Lord Stanley of A., p. 43.

1540. "The root which among the Indians of Spagnuola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomè (C. Verde group) call Igname, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e. the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branchlets; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of San Tomè under the Equinoctial, Ramusio, i. 117v.

c. 1550. "They have two other sorts of roots, one called batata. . . . They generate windiness, and are commonly cooked in the embers. Some say they taste like almond cakes, or sugared chestnuts; but in my opinion chestnuts, even without sugar, are better."—Girof. Benzoni, Hak. Soc. 86.

1588. "Wee met with sixtee or seventee sayles of Canoes full of Saunages, who came off to Sea vnto vs, and brought with them in their Boates, Plantans, Cocos, Potato- rootes, and fresh fish."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candish, Purchas, i. 66.

1600. "The Battatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Iniamas (see Yam), and taste like Earth-nuts."—In Purchas, ii. 957.

1615. "I tooke a garden this day, and planted it with Pottatos brought from the Liquea, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a try, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cocks's Diary, i. 11.

1645. ". . . patatte; c'est vne racine comme naueaux, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tres-bon goust, mais si l'on en mange souuent, elle degoustte fort, et est assez venteuse."—Mocquet, Voyages, 83.

1764. "There let Potatos mantle o'er the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Grainger, Bk. iv.

Syce, s. Hind. from Arab. sāis. A groom. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz., ghoravāllā.

The Ar. verb, of which sāis is the participle, seems itself to be a loan-word from Syriac, sausi, 'coax.'

1810. "The Syce, or groom, attends but one horse."—Williamson, V. M., i. 254.

c. 1858?

"Tandis que les çais veillent les chiens rodeur."
Leconte de Lisle.

Sycee, s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.) The origin of the name is said to be si (pron. at Canton sai and ser) = sz, i.e. 'fine silk'; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads.

Syras, Cyrus, s. See under Cyrus.

Syriam, n. p. A place on the Pegu R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-lyeng, but probably the Talaing name was nearer that which foreigners give it. Syriam was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which very little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587. "To Cirion a port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woollen Cloth, Scarlets, Velvets, Opium, and such like."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, i. 393.

1600. "I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fiftene dayes arrived at Sirian the chiefe Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Rivers set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now overwhelmed with ruines of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the wayes and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of carkasses prohibiteth the way and passage of ships."—The Jesuit Andrew Boves, in Purchas, ii. 1748.

c. 1606. "Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serido), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom of Pegu, and with the ports of Martavan, Tavay, Tenasserim, and Juncalon. . . . Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coronandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian."—Bocarro, 135.

1695. "9th. That the Old house and Ground at Syrian, formerly belonging to the English Company, may still be continued to them, and that they may have liberty of building dwelling-houses, and warehouses, for the securing their Goods, as shall be necessary, and that more Ground be given them, if what they formerly had be not sufficient."—Petition presented to the K. of Burma at Ava, by Ed. Fleetwood; in Dalrymple, A. R., ii. 374.

1726. Zierjang (Syrian) in Valentin, Choro., &c., 127.

1727. "About 60 Miles to the Eastward of China Backaar (see China-Buckeer) is the Bar of Syrian, the only Port now open for Trade in all the Pegu Dominions. . . . It was many Years in Possession of the Portuguese, till by their Insolence and Pride they were obliged to quit it."—A. Ham. ii. 31-32.

Syud, s. Ar. saiyyid, a lord. The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed.

But the usage of Saiyyid and Sharif varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia.

1404. "On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahomad."—Clavijo, § cxiv. (Markham, p. 141-2).

1869. "Il y a dans l'Inde quatre classes de musulmans : les Saiyids ou descendants de Mahomet par Huguin, les Schakhis ou Arabes, nommés vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afgans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune fourni à la religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent designés par ces dénominations, et par d'autres spécialement consacrées à chacune d'elles, telles que Mir pour les Saiyids, Khan pour les Pathans, Mirza, Beg, Agá, et Khawája pour les Mogols."—Garcin de Tassy, Religion Mus. dans l'Inde, 22.

(The learned author is mistaken here in supposing that the obsolete term Moor was in India specially applied to Arabs. It was applied, following Portuguese example, to all Mahommedans.)

T.

Tabasheer, s. 'Sugar of Bamboo.' A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as a medicine. The word is Pers. tabāshīr, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, tvakshīra, and tavakshīra. The substance is often confounded, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spodium, and is sometimes called ispodio di canna. See Ces. Federici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 segg.).

c. 1150. "Tanah (miswritten Banah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe. . . . Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le . . . kana et le . . . tabāshīr . . . Quant au tēbachir, on le falsifie en le mélangeant avec de la cendre d'ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu'on extrait des racines du roseau dit . . . at Shark."—Edrisi, i. 179.

1563. "And much less are the roots of the cane tabaxer; so that according to both the translations Avicena is wrong; and Averrois says that it is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal."—Garcia, f. 195v.

c. 1570. "Il Spodio si congela d'acqua in alcune canne, e io n'ho trovato assai nel Pegu quando facevo fabricar la mia casa."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus. iii. 397.

1578. "The spodium or Tabaxir of the Persians . . . was not known to the Greeks."—Acosta, 295.

c. 1580. "Spodium Tabaxir vocant, quo nomine vulgus pharmacopoeorum Spodium factitium, quippe metallicum, intelligunt. At eruditiores viri eo nomine lacrymam quandam, ex caudice arboris proceræ in India nascentis, albicantem, odoratam, facultatis refrigeratoriæ, et cor maxime roborantis itidem intelligunt."—Prosper Alpinus, Rerum Ægyptiarum, Lib. III. vii.

1598. ". . . these Mambus have a certain Matter within them, which is (as it were) the pith of it . . . the Indians call i.

Sacar Mambu, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mambu, and is a very deep Medicinal thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabians, Persians, and Moores, that call it Tabaxiir."—Linschoten, p. 104.

In the following passage, which we had overlooked till now, we are glad to find so judicious a writer as Royle taking the view that we have expressed already under Sugar:

1837. "Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccharum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccharum, or the substance known to this name by the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer. . . . Considering that this substance is pure silex, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of σάκχαρον μέλιτον."—Royle on the Ant. of Hindoo Medicine, p. 83.

1854. "In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a flinty secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries."—Engl. Cycl. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

Tabby, s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabi, Ital. tabino, Fr. tabis, from Arab. 'attābī, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Baghdad called al-'attābiya. And this derived its name from a prince of the 'Omayyad family called 'Attāb.

12th cent. "The 'Attābiya . . . here are made the stuffs, called 'Attābiya, which are silks and cottons of divers colours."—Ibn Jubair, p. 227.

Taboot, s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahommedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kerbela, which is carried in procession during the Moharram (see Herklots, 2nd ed. 119 seqq., and Garcin de Tassy, Relig. Musulm. dans l'Inde, 36).

Tael, s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz.,  $\frac{1}{10}$  of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called the "ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or tael is, according to Dr. Wells Williams, = 579.84 grs.

trov. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tsien, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tael used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 8d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review puts it at 5s. 7½d. (Sept. p. 362); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13th, 1885, was 4s. 9½d.

The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tahil is the name of a weight: and this again, as Crawford indicates, is probably from the India tola (q.v.).

The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels = 1 catty, 100 catties = 1 pecul = 133½lbs. avoird.

Milburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copangs = 1 mace, 5 mace = 1 mayam, 16 mayam = 1 tale, 5 tale = 1 buncal, 20 buncals = 1 catty, 200 catties = 1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as = 2lbs. 1oz. 13dr. Of these names, mace, tale, and bahar (qq.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, mayam, banghal, and kati Malay.

1540. "And those three junks which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (taeis), which are in our money 300,000  cruzados, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598. "A Tael is a full ounce and a halfe Portingale weight."—Linschoten, 44.

1599. "Est et ponderis genus, quod Tael vocant in Malacca. Tael unum in Malacca pendet 16 masas."—De Bry, ii. 64.

"Four hundred cashes make a cowpan. Four cowpans are one mas. Four masses make a Perdaw (see Pardao in Suppl.) Four Perdaws make a Tayel."—Capt. T. Davis in Purchas, i. 123.

c. 1608. "Bezar stones are thus bought by the Taille . . . which is one Ounce, and the third part English."—Saris, in c. 392.

1613. "A Taye is five shillinge sterling."—Saris, in c. 369.

1643. "Les Portugais sont fort desirieux de ces Chinois pour esclaves . . . il y a des Chinois faicts à ce mestier . . . quand ils voyent quelque beau petit garçon ou fille . . . les enleuent par force et les cachent . . . puis viennent sur la rive de la mer, ou ils scauent que sont les trafiquans à qui ils les vendent 12 et 15 tayes chacun, qui est enuiron 25 escus."—Mocquet, 342.

c. 1656. "Vn Religieux Chinois qui a esté surpris avec des femmes de debauché . . . l'on a percé le col avec vn fer chaud; à ce fer est attaché vne chaine de fer d'environ dix brasses, qu'il est obligé de traîner jusques à ce qu'il ait apporté au Couvent trente theyls d'argent qu'il faut qu'il amasse en demandant l'aumône."—In Theriot, Divers Voyages, ii. 67.

Tahseeldar, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (pargana or tāl'uk) of a district (zilla). Hind. from Pers. tahsildār and that from Ar. tahsīl, 'collection.' This is a term of the Mahommedan administration which we have adopted.

It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cash-keeper in a firm, or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.

1799. "... He (Tippoo) divided his country into 37 Provinces under Dewans ... and he subdivided these again into 1025 inferior districts, having each a Tisheldar."—Letter of Munro, in Life, i. 215.

1808. "... he continues to this hour tehsildar of the petty pergunnah of Sheopore."—Fifth Report, 583.

1810. "... the sircar, or tusseeldar (cash-keeper) receiving one key, and the master retaining the other."—Williamson, V. M., i. 209.

Tailor-bird. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together "one leaf or more, generally two leaves, on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after passing the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it." (Jerdon). It is Orthotomus longicauda, Gmelin (sub-fam. Drymoicinæ).

1883. "Clear and loud above all ... sounds the to-whew, to-whew, to-whew of the tailor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrious spouse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the durzee, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very doorstep, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little tailors."—Tribes on My Frontier, 145.

Talaing, n. p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternately conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Mōn or Mūn.

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay On the History of Pegu (J. As. Soc. Bengal, vol. xlii, Pt. i.).

"The names given in the histories of Tha-htun and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin ... may be recognised as Karnāta, Kalinga, Venga, and Vizianagaram ... probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar ... The word Talingāna never occurs in the Peguan histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33).

"The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rāmanya by settlers from Talingāna, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talaing, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmese and to all peoples of the west. But the Peguans call themselves by a different name ... Mun, Murun, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talaing archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view. He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of last century) the name Talaing was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talaing' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of the Burmese conqueror. They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatized them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. 'Talaing means' (in the Mun language) "one who is trodden under foot, a slave' . . . Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substituting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talaing' and 'Telingana' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological . . . from the resemblance . . . must necessarily be void ab initio."—Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of British Burma, Pt. ii. pp. 11-12. Rangoon, 1884.

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied.

But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talaing earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talaing literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof. Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talaing or Mun people with the (so-called) Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one.

1795. "The present King of the Birmans . . . has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Taliens, or native Peguers. Justice is now impartially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Talien, consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

Talapoin, s. A word used by Portuguese, and after them by French and other continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the term is obscure. Monseigneur Pallegoix, in his Desc. du Royaume Thai ou Siam (ii. 23) says: "Les Européens les ont appelés talapoins, probablement du nom de l'éventail qu'ils tiennent à la main, lequel s'appelle talapat," qui signifie feuille de palmier." This at first seems to have nothing to recommend it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by Koeppen (Rel. des Buddhas, i. 331 note), and by Bishop Bigandet (J. Ind. Archip. iv. 220).

c. 1554. 1880. "The Phongnies, or Buddhist Monks, sometimes called Talapoins, a name given to them, and introduced into Europe by the Portuguese, from their carrying a fan formed of tāla-pat, or palm-leaves."—Saty. Rev., Feb. 21, p. 266, quoting Bp. Bigandet.

Talee, s. Tamil, tāli. A small trinket of gold which is fastened by a string round the neck of a married woman in S. India.

It may be a curious question whether the word may not be an adoption from the Ar. tahīl, "qui signifie proprement: prononcer la formule tā ilāha illā 'ilāh . . . Cette formule, écrite sur un morceau de papier, servait d'amulette . . . le tout était renfermé dans un étui auquel on donnait le nom de tahīl" (Dozy & Engelmann, 346). These Mahomedan tahīls were worn by a band, and were the origin of the Spanish word tali ('a baldrick').

The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogerius, but the custom is alluded to by earlier writers, e.g. Gouvea, Synodo, f. 43v.

1651. "So the Bridegroom takes this Tali, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogerius, 45.

1672. "Among some of the Christians there is also an evil custom, that they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage bond, allow the Bridegroom to tie a Tali or little band round the Bride's neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that it is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Baldacus, Zeylon (German), 408.

1674. "The bridegroom attaches to the neck of the bride a line from which hang three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods: and this they call Tale; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1704. "Praeterca, quum moris hujus Regionis sit, ut infantes sex vel septem annorum, interdum etiam in teneriori aetate, ex gonitorum consensu, matrimonium indissolubile de praesenti contrahant, per impositionem Talii, seu aureae tesserae nuptialis, uxoris collo pensilis: missionariis mandamus ne hujusmodi irrita matrimonia inter Christianos fieri permittant."—Decree of Card. Tournon, in Norbert, Mem. Hist., i. 155.

1726. "And on the betrothal day the Tali, or bride's betrothal band, is tied round her neck by the Bramin . . . and this she must not untie in her husband's life."—Valentijn, Chorom., 51.

Taliar, Tarryar, s. A watchman (S. India). Tamil, talaiyāri.

1680. "The Peons and Tarryars sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted . . . returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for Battee" (see Batta, and in Suppt.); "also the Pedda Naigu was fined in like manner for his Tarryars."—Fort St. George Consns., Feby. 10th. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1873, No. III. p. 3.

1693. "Taliars and Peons appointed to watch the Black Town . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 267.

1707. "Resolving to march 250 soldiers, 200 talliards, and 200 peons."—In Do., ii. 74.

Talipot, s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Corypha umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tāl-patra, Hind. tālpāt, 'leaf of the tāla tree,' properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, etc. See under Talapoin.

Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common.

The quotation from Jordanus, though using no name, refers to this tree.

c. 1328. "In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordanus, 29–30.

c. 1430. "These leaves are used in this country for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: "There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write."—N. Conti, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672. "Talpets or sunshades."—Baldaeus, Dutch ed., 102.

1681. "There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is the Talipot . . ."—Knoz, 15.

1803. "The talipot tree . . . affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-coat tree would be in this. A leaf of the talipot-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3d ed., iii. 15.

1874. "... dans les embrasures . . . s'étaient des bananiers, des talipots . . ."—Frantz, Souvenirs d'un Cosaque, ch. iv.

1881. "The lofty head of the talipot palm . . . the proud queen of the tribe in Ceylon, towers above the scrub on every side. Its trunk is perfectly straight and white, like a slender marble column, and often more than 100 feet high. Each of the fans that compose the crown of leaves covers a semi-circle of from 12 to 16 feet radius, a surface of 150 to 200 square feet."—Haeckel's Visit to Ceylon, E. T., p. 129.

Talisman, s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahommedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Arabic term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. tulāmiza, 'students, disciples?'

1471. "In questa città è vna fossa d'acqua nel modo di vna fontana, la qual' è guardata da quelli suoi Talassimani, cioè preti; quest' acqua dicono che ha gran virtù contra la lebra, e contra le caualette."—Giosafà Barbaro, in Ramusio, ii. f. 107.

1535. "Non vi sarebbe più confusione S'a Damasco il Soldan desse l'assalto; Un muover d'arme, un correr di persone E di talacimanni un gridar d'alto."—Ariosto, xviii. 7.

1610. "Some hauing two, some foure, some sixe adioyning turrets, exceeding high, and exceeding slender: tarrast aloft on the outside like the maine top of a ship . . . from which the Talismanni with elated voices (for they vse no bells) do congregate the people . . ."—Sandys, p. 31.

c. 1630. "The Fylalli converse most in the Alcoran. The Derussi are wandering wolves in sheepes cloathing. The Talismanni regard the houres of prayer by turning the 4 hour'd glasse. The Muyezini crie from the tops of Mosques, battologizing Lilala Hyllula."—Sir T. Herbert, 267.

1687. “. . . It is reported by the Turks that . . . the victorious Sultan . . . went with all Magnificent pomp and solemnity to pay his thanksgiving and devotions at the church of Sancta Sophia; the Magnificence so pleased him, that he immediately added a yearly Rent of 10,000 zechlins to the former Endowments, for the maintenance of Imams or Priests, Doctours of their Law, Talismans and others who continually attend there for the education of youth . . .”—Sir P. Rycaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 54.

Tāliyāmār, s. Sea Hind. for ‘cut-water.’ Port. talhumar.—Roebuck.

Tallica, s. H. from Arab. ta’liqah. An invoice or schedule.

1682. “. . . that he . . . would send another Droga or Customer on purpose to take our Tallicas.”—Hedges, Dec. 26.

Talook, s. This word (Arab. ta’lūk, from root ’alak, to hang or depend) has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a District, presided over as regards revenue matters by a tahsildār. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of proprietary land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zemindaries, and sometimes subordinate to, or dependent on Zemindars. In the N. W. Prov. and Oudh the ta’lūk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors or classes of proprietors, one being superior, the other inferior (see next article).

Ta’lūk is also used in Hind. for ‘department’ of administration.

Talookdār. Hind. from Pers. ta’l-lukdār, ‘the holder of a ta’lūk, in either of the senses of that word; i.e. either a Government officer collecting the revenue of a ta’lūk (though in this sense it is probably now obsolete everywhere), or the holder of an estate so designated. The famous Talookdars of Oudh are large landholders, possessing both villages of which they are sole proprietors, and other villages, in which there are subordinate holders, in which the Talookdār is only the superior proprietor (see Carnegie, Kachari Technicalities).

Tamarind, s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamarindus indica, L., N. O. Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa.

The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar. tamar-u’l-Hind, ‘date of India,’ or perhaps rather, in Persian form, tamār-i-Hindī. It is possible that the original name may have been thamar, (‘fruit’) of India, rather than tamar, (‘date’).

1298. “When they have taken a merchant vessel, they force the merchants to swallow a stuff called Tamarindi, mixed in sea-water, which produces a violent purging.”—Marco Polo, 2d ed., ii. 383.

c. 1335. “L’arbre appelé hammar, c’est à dire al-tamar-al-Hindi, est un arbre sauvage qui couvre les montagnes.”—Mas’lik-al-abgar, in Not. et Eccl. xiii. 175.

1563. “It is called in Malavar puli, and in Guzerat ambili, and this is the name they have among all the other people of this India; and the Arab calls it tamarindi, because tamar, as you well know, is our tamar, or, as the Castilians say, datil [i.e. date], so that tamarindi are ‘dates of India’; and this was because the Arabs could not think of a name more appropriate on account of its having stones inside, and not because either the tree or the fruit had any resemblance.”—Garcia, f. 200.

c. 1580. “In febribus verò pestilentibus, atque omnibus aliis ex putridis, exurentibus, aquam, in qua multa copia Tamarindorum infusa fuerit cum saccharo ebibunt.”—Prosper Alpinus (De Plantis Aegypti) ed. Lugd. Bat. 1735, ii. 20.

1582. “They have great store of Tamarindos . . .”—Castañeda (by N. L.), f. 94.

1611. “That wood which we cut for firewood did all hang trased with cods of greene fruit (as big as a Bean-cod in England) called Tamerin; it hath a very soure tast, and by the Apothecaries is held good against the Scurvie.”—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 277.

1829. “A singularly beautiful Tamarind tree (ever the most graceful, and amongst the most magnificent of trees) . . .”—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 98.

1877. “The natives have a saying that sleeping beneath the ‘Date of Hind’ gives you fever, which you cure by sleeping under a nim tree (Melia azadirachta), the lilac of Persia.”—Sind Revisited, i. 92.

The nim tree (pace Capt. Burton) is not the ‘lilac of Persia’ (see Bukyne). The prejudice against encamping or sleeping under a tamarind tree is general over India. But, curiously, Bp. Pallegoix speaks of it as the practice of the Siamese “to rest and play under the beneficent shade of the Tamarind" (Desc. du Royaume Thai ou Siam, i. 136).

Tamarind-fish, s. This is an excellent zest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in tamarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short, and in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:—

"The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seir fish, and from the Lates calcarifer, known as Cockup in Calcutta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polymemus (or Roe-ball, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish." The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Cochin. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

Tamberanee, s. Malayā. tamburān, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Sāiva monks in the Tamil countries.

1510. "Dice l'altro Tamarai: zoe Per Dio? L'altro respōde Tamarani: zoe Per Dio."—Varthema, ed. 1517, f. 45.

Tana, Tanna, n. p. Thāna, a town on the Island of Salsette on the strait ('River of Tana') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 miles N.E. of Bombay, and in the early middle ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see Concan), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1020. "From Dhār southwards to the river Nerbudda, nine; thence to Maharat-des . . . eighteen; thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasangs."—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 60.

1298. "Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the west . . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 27.

1321. "After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Parocco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supera (Supara)." —Letter of Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

c. 1323. "And having thus embarked I passed over in 28 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom . . . The land is under the dominion of the Saracens . . ." —Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., i. 57-58.

1516. "25 leagues further on the coast is a fortress of the before-named king, called Tana-Mayambu" (this is perhaps rather Bombay).—Barbosa, 68.

1529. "And because the norwest winds blew strong, winds contrary to his course, after going a little way he turned and anchored in sight of the island, where were stationed the foists with their captain-in-chief Alixa, who seeing our fleet in motion put on his oars and assembled at the River of Tana, and when the wind came round our fleet made sail, and anchored at the mouth of the River of Tana, for the wind would not allow of its entering."—Correa, iii. 290.

1673. "The Chief City of this Island is called Tanaw; in which are Seven Churches and Colleges, the chiefest one of the Paulistines . . . Here are made good Stuffs of Silk and Cotton."—Fryer, 73.

Tana, Thana, s. A Police station. H. thāna, thānā. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

c. 1640-50. "Thānah means a corps of cavalry, matchlockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thānah, and to despatch provisions (rasad—see russud) to the next Thānah."—Pādīshāh nāmāh, quoted by Blochmann, in Āin, i. 345.

Tanadar, Thanadar, s. The chief of a police station, Hind. thānadār. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516. In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e. 1516), the King Don Manoel constitutes João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa. —Arquivo Port. Orient., fasc. 5, 1-3.

1519. "Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tannadar of this Isle of Tygoari (i.e. Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will now encharge you with."—Id. p. 35.

c. 1548. "In Aguaci is a great mosque (mazquita), which is occupied by the tenadars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain petyas (yards?) in which bate (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness."—Tombo, in Subsidios, 216.

Tanga, s. Mahr. tāik, Turki tanga. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkestan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 7½d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanka is of Chaghatai Turki origin, being derived from tang, which in that language means white (H. of Buber and Humayun, i. 346). Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Barbaro, who says this, viz., that certain silver coins are called by the Mingrelians tetari, by the Greeks aspri, by the Turks akcha, and by the Zagutais tengh, all which words in the respective languages signify 'white.' We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambéry or of Pavet de Courteille;—the latter only having tengul, 'fer-blanc.' And the obvious derivation is the Sansk. ṭāṇka, 'a weight (of silver) equal to 4 māshas, . . . a stamped coin.' The word, in the forms ṭākā (see tucka) and ṭāṅga (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, "in all the dialects, laxly used for money in general" (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmūd of Ghazni, A.D. 418, 419 (A.D. 1027-28) we find on the Sanskrit legend of the reverse the word ṭāṇka in correspondence with the dirham of the Arabic obverse (see Thomas, Pathān Kings, p. 49).

Ṭāṇka or Tāṅga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the Rupee (q.v.) of later days. And in fact this application of the word, in the form ṭākā, is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333—1343 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current, a tanka or ḍinār of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver ḍinārs. These silver ḍinārs (or rupees) are called by the author of the Masālik-al-Absār (c. 1340) the "silver tanka of India." The gold and silver tanka continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Feroz Shāh, the son of Mahommed (1351—1388) and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Buhlul (1488-1517), we find black (or copper) tankas, of which 20 went to the old silver tanka.

We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkestan.

But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Linschoten and Grose. Indeed the name still survives at Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tāṅga of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form dengi. See a quotation under Copeck.

c. 1335. "According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red lak contains 100,000 golden tankahs, and the white lak 100,000 (silver) tankahs. The golden tanka, called in this country the red tanka, is equivalent to three *mithkāl*s, and the silver tanka is equivalent to 8 hasht-kīnī dirhams, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirham current in Egypt and Syria."—Masālik-al-absār, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 211.

c. 1340. "Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 6233 tankas, i.e., the equivalent of the 55,000 ḍinārs (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after deducting of course the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tanka is 2½ ḍinārs in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 426.

c. 1370. "Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka, and the silver tanka." &c.—Tārīkh-i-Firoz Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 357.

1404. "... vna sua moneda de plata que llaman Tāṅgaes."—Clavijo, f. 46b.

1516. "... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a fanon of Calicut, . . . and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tāṅga, and they are of very fine silver."—Barbosa, 45.

c. 1541. "Todar . . . fixed first a golden ashrafi as the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the Ghakkars to flock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay gradually fell to 5 tankas, till the fortress (Rōhtās) was completed."—Tarikh-i-Khān-Jahān Lodi, in Elliot, v. 115.

(These are the Bahluli or Sikandari tankas of copper, as are also those in the next quotation from Elliot.)

1559. "The old Muscovite money is not round but oblong or egg-shaped, and is called denga . . . 100 of these coins make a Hungarian gold-piece; 6 dengas make an altin; 20 a grifna; 100 a pottina; and 200 a ruble."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii., f. 158v.

1592-3. "At the present time, namely, A.H. 1002, Hindustan contains 3200 towns, and upon each town are dependent 200, 500, 1000, or 1500 villages. The whole yields a revenue of 640 krors muraddi tankas."—Tabakāt-i-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 186.

1598. "There is also a kinde of reckoning of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named onely in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw, or Xeraphin badde money, for you must understande that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde, for foure Tangas good money are as much as five Tangas badde money."—Linshoten, ch. 35.

1615. "Their monyes in Persia of silver, are the . . . the rest of copper, like the Tangas and Pisos of India."—Richard Steele, in Purchas, i. 543.

c. 1750-60. "Throughout Malabar and Goa, they use tangas, vintins, and pardoo xeraphin."—Grose, i. 283.

The Goa tanga was worth 60 reis, that of Ormus 62  $\frac{2}{3}$  to 69  $\frac{1}{3}$  reis.

"As to the Tanguns or Tanyans, so much esteemed in India for their hardness, they come entirely from the Upper Tibet, and notwithstanding their make, are so sure footed that the people of Nepal ride them without fear over very steep mountains, and along the brink of the deepest precipices."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 135.

Tanjore, n. p. A city and District of S. India; properly Tanjāvūr ('Low Town'?), so written in the inscription on the great Tanjore Pagoda (11th century).

Tank, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word, Shakespear gives: "Tank'h (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water." Wilson gives: "Tānken or tāken, Mahr., . . . Tānkh (said to be Guzerāthi). A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tānki, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well." R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzeratte, &c. gives: "Tanka (Mah.) and Tankoo (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick and lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses . . . They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down" . . . "In the towns of Bikaner," says Tod, "most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tankas, filled by the rains" (Rajputana, ii. 202). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Mārwar, he says, "they collect the rain water in reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness" (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J. A. S. B., ix. pt. 2, 891), describing a journey in the Nerbudda Basin, cites the word, and notes: "I first heard this word used by a native in the Betool district; on asking him if at the top of Bowergurrh there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukha (stone and cement) for holding water." Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-2, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain-cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: "Those cisterns or wells are called by the people tánkás" (App. p. 21). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of this word, which may possibly be from Sansk. taḍaga, taṭāga, or taṭāka, 'a pond, pool, or tank.'

Fr. Paolino, on the other hand, says the word tunque used by the Portuguese in India was Portoghuesa corrotta, which is vague. But in fact tunque is a word which appears in all the Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed could it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajpūtāna, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word.

This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzerati and Mahratti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tank in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship.

Indeed the Port. tunque is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagno, Fr. old estang and estan, mod. étang, Sp. estangue, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

1589. "They had in them stanges or poudes of water full of fish of sundrie sortes."—Parkes's Mendoza (Hak. Soc.) ii. 46. c. 1785.

"I never drank the Muses' stank,

Castalia's burn and a'that;

But there it streams, and richly reams,
My Helicon I ca' that."—Burns.

It will be seen that Pyrard de Laval uses estang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1498. "And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their portraiture was in a divers kind, for their teeth were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tunque wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way."
—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 57.

"So the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelho to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchediya) a building, a church of great ashlar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tunque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tunque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrio."

1553. "In this place where the King (Bahadur Shah) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tank (tunque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter's waters, they make these tanks (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big that many are more than a league in compass."—Barros, IV. vi. 5.

.. "Taptee or Tapy."—Ib. 244.

Tappaul, s. The word used in S. India for 'post,' in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connexion with the French étape (which is the same originally as the English staple). It is sometimes found at the end of last century written tappa or tappy. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write tappā as a singular of tappālu, taking the latter for a plural (C. P. B.).

Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the S. and West, Mr. Beames assigns to it an Aryan origin: "tappā 'post-office,' i.e. place where letters are stamped, tappāl 'letter-post' (tappā + alya = "stamping-house")," connecting it radically with tāpā 'a coop,' tāpnā 'to tap,' 'flatten,' 'beat down,' tapak 'a sledge hammer,' tāpnā 'to press,' &c. (?)

1799. "You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tappal to Poonah."—Wellington, i. 50.

1800. "The Tappal does not go 30 miles a day."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 244.

1809. "Requiring only two sets of bearers I knew I might go by tappaul the whole way to Seringatam."—Ld. Valentia, i. 385.

Tare and Tret. Whence comes this odd firm in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Arabic ṭarāḥa 'to reject,' as pointed out by Dozy. Tret is alleged to be from Italian tritare to crumble or grind, perhaps rather from trito, ground or triturated.

Tarega, s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the Hong Merchants of Canton in former days) in Pegu, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Telugu taraga, 'the occupation of a broker'; Tamil, taragari, 'a broker.'

1563. "Sono in Pegu otto sensari del Re che si chiamano Tarege li quali sono obligati di far vendere tutte le mercantie . . . per il prezzo corrente."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus iii. 395.

1583. ". . . e se fosse alcuno che a tempo del pagamento per non pagar si absentasse dalla città, o si ascondesse, il Tarrecā e obligato pagar per lui . . . i Tarrecā così si demandano i sensari."—G. Balbi, f. 107v, 108.

1587. "There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tareghe, which are bound to sell your goods at the price they be Woorth, and you give them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your marchandises vpon their word."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 393.

Tariff, s. This comes from Arab. ta'rif, ta'rifā, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port., and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

Tarouk, or Taroup, n. p. Burni. Tarūk, Tarūp. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Tarūk-mau, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the middle ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsin; though the coupled names Tarūk and Taret, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, "may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Taruk is a form of Türk, whilst Taret is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Taruk and Taret are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burma, pp. 8, 11, 56).

Tashreef, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "conferring honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, presenting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation" (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonious politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' 'to condescend to visit'—. The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement.

In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1674. "He (Lingapa, naik of Poona-malee) had, he said, carried a tasheriff to the English, and they had refused to take it . . ."—Op. cit., i. 84.

1680. "It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona being deceased), resolved Bera Pedda Vincatadry do succeed and the Tasheriffs be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlett to Pedda Vincatadry, and 2½ yards each to four others . . .

"The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholly and would not eat because her husband had received no Tasheriff, he also is Tasheriff with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. George Consns., April 6th. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1873, p. 15.

1685. "Gopall Pundit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue . . . that we may engage him . . . to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cuddalore) than we have as yet—It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tasheriff as followeth" (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 148.

1853. "... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1875. "You young Gentlemen rode over on your tatts, I suppose? The Subaltern's tat—that is the name, you know, they give to a pony in this country—is the most useful animal you can imagine."—The Dilemma, ch. ii.

Tatty, s. Hind. tattī and tātī. A screen or mat made of the roots of a fragrant grass (see Cuscus) with which door or window openings are filled up in the season of hot winds. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also Thermantidote.

The principle of the tatty is involved in the first quotation, though Dr. Fryer does not mention the grass-mats:

c. 1665. "... or having in lieu of Cellarage certain Kas-Kanays, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Roots, that are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre . . . that so the Servants may easily with their Pompion-bottles, water them from without."—Bernier, E. T., 79.

1673. "They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together . . . repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloath, continually hanging before the chamber-windows."—Fryer, p. 47.

1808. "... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to make use of tattees, a kind of screens made of the roots of a coarse grass called Kus."—Broughton's Letters, 110.

1809. "Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be insufferable, were it not for the tattyies which are easily applied to a house one story high."—Ld. Valentia, i. 104.

1810. "During the hot winds tatts (a kind of mat), made of the root of the koosa grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows."—Maria Graham, 125.

Taut, s. Hind. tāt; sackcloth.

1820. "... made into coarse cloth taut, by the Brinjaries and people who use pack bullocks for making bags (gonies [see Gunny]) for holding grain, &c."—Tr. Bo. Lit. Soc., iii. 244.

Tavoy, n. p. A town and district of what we call the Tenasserim Province of B. Burma. The Burmese call it Dha-wé; but our name is probably adopted from a Malay form. The original name is supposed to be Siamese.

1553. "The greater part of this tract is mountainous, and inhabited by the nation of Brammas and Jangomas, who interpose on the east of this kingdom (Pegu) between it and the great kingdom of Siam; which kingdom of Siam borders the sea from the city of Tavay downwards."—Barros, III. iii. 4.

1583. "Also some of the rich people in a place subject to the Kingdom of Pegu, called Tavae, where is produced a quantity of what they call in their language Calain, but which in our language is called Calaya (see Calay), in summer leave their houses and go into the country, where they make some sheds to cover them, and there they stop three months, leaving their usual dwellings with food in them for the devil, and this they do in order that in the other nine months he may give them no trouble, but rather be propitious and favourable to them."—G. Balbi, f. 125.

1587. "... Iland of Tavi, from which cometh great store of Tinne which serveth all India."—R. Fitch, in Hakl., ii. 395.

1695. "10th. That your Majesty, of your wonted favour and charity to all distresses, would be pleased to look with Eyes of Pity, upon the poor English Captive, Thomas Browne, who is the only one surviving of four that were accidentally drove into Tauwy by Storm, as they were going for Atcheen about 10 years ago, in the service of the English Company."—Petition to King of Burma, presented at Ava by Edward Fleetwood, in Dabrymple's Or. Report., ii. 374.

Tazee, n. A.—P.—H.—ta'ziya, 'mourning for the dead.' In India the word is specially applied to the representations, in flimsy material, of the tombs of Hussein and Hassan which are carried in the Muharram processions. In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season.

The word has been carried to the W. Indies by the coolies, whose great festival (whether they be Mahomedans or Hindus) the Muljarram has become. And the attempt to carry the Tazeear through one of the towns of Trinidad, in spite of orders to the contrary, led in the end of 1884 to a sad catastrophe.

1809. "There were more than a hundred Taziys, each followed by a long train of Fuqueers, dressed in the most extravagant manner, beating their breasts . . . such of the Mahratta Surdars as are not Brahmuns frequently construct Taziys at their own tents, and expend large sums of money upon them."—Broughton's Letters, 72.

1869. "En lisant la description . . . de ces fêtes on croira souvent qu'il s'agit de fêtes hindous. Telle est par exemple la solennité du ta'zia ou deuil, établie en commémoration du martyre de Huçain, laquelle est semblable en bien de points à celle du Durga-pujâ. . . Le ta'ziya dure dix jours comme le Durga-pujâ. Le dixième jour, les Hindous précipitent dans la rivière la statue de la déesse au milieu d'une foule immense, avec un grand appareil et au son de mille instruments de musique; la même chose a lieu pour les représentations du tombeau de Huçain."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm., p. 11.

Tea, s. Crawford alleges that we got this word in its various European forms from the Malay Te, the Chinese name being Chihâ. The latter is indeed the pronunciation attached, when reading in the 'mandarin dialect,' to the character representing the tea-plant, and is the form which has accompanied the knowledge of tea to India, Persia, Portugal, Greece (τσάι), and Russia. But though it may be probable that Te, like several other names of articles of trade, may have come to us through the Malay, the word is, not the less, originally Chinese, Tê (or Tuy as Medhurst writes it) being the utterance attached to the character in the Fuh-kien dialect. The original pronunciation, whether direct from Fuh-kien or through the Malay, accompanied the introduction of tea to England as well as other countries of Western Europe. This is shown by several couplets in Pope, e.g.

" . . . There stands a structure of majestic frame Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name.

* * *
Here thou, great ANNA, whom three Realms obey,

Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes tea." Rape of the Lock, iii.

Here tuy was evidently the pronunciation, as in Fuh-kien. The Rapo of the Lock was published in 1711. In Gray's Trivia, published in 1720, we find tea rhyme to pay, in a passage needless to quote (ii. 296). Fifty years later there seems no room for doubt that the pronunciation had changed to that now in use, as is shown by Johnson's extemporised verses (circa 1770):

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear,
That thou wilt give to me
With cream and sugar soften'd well,
Another dish of tea,"—and so on.
(In Johnsoniana, Boswell, ed. 1835, ix. 194.)

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea,
And in the house of Mrs. P."
The Trial of Sarah, &c.

And in Zeller's Lexicon (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or Tea, but pronounce it Tiy, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation.

Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Rh-ya, which is believed to date from long before our era, under the names K'ia and K'u-tu (K'u= 'bitter'), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th cent. A.D. describes it, adding "From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage" (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13). But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the T'ang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the next century, in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shah Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-1421).* The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio's (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigazioni e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommed, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chiai-Catai (i.e. Pers. Chā-i-Khitāi, 'Tea of China') concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendoça on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below. Milburn gives some curious extracts from the E. I. Co.'s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, 1666, June 30, among certain "rare-tyes," chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

"22½ lbs. of thea at 50s. per lb. = £56 17 6
For the two cheefe persons that attended his Majesty, thea . . . . . 6 15 6"

In 1667 the E. I. Co.'s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: "to send home by these ships 100lb. weight of the best tey that you can get." The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143½ lbs. (Milburn, ii. 531).

A.D. 851. "The King (of China) reserves to himself . . . a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sākḥ. It has more leaves than the ratt'ah (Medicago sativa) recens and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances."—Relation, &c., trad. par Reinaud, i. 40.

c. 1545. "Moreover, seeing the great de-

Mendoça for the Hak. Soc. says of this embassy, that at their halt in the desert 12 marches from Su-chau, they were regaled "with a variety of strong liquors, together with a pot of Chinese tea." It is not stated by Mr. Major whence he took the account; but there is nothing about tea in the translation of M. Quatremère (Not. et Ent., xiv. pt. 1), nor in the Persian text given by him, nor in the translation by Mr. Rehatsek in the Indian Antiquary, ii. 75 seqq.

light that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chaggi Memet, i.e., Hajji Mahommed) told me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chiai Catai: it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cahan-fu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all those regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and boil it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailments which I can't now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if any one chance to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him, and judging from what he said these people would at any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of Chiai Catai. These people of Cathay say (he told us) that if in our country, and in Persia, and the land of the Franks, it was known, merchants would no longer invest their money in Rauend Chini as they call rhubarb."—Ramusio, Dichiaratione, in ii. f. 15.

c. 1560. "Whatsoever person or persones come to any mans house of qualitee, hee hath a custome to offer him in a fine basket one Porcelane . . . with a kinde of drinke which they call cha, which is somewhat bitter, red, and medicinall, which they are wont to make with a certayne concoction of herbes."—Da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 180.

1565. "Ritus est Japoniorum . . . benevolentiae causā præbere spectanda, quæ apud se pretiosissima sunt, id est, omne instrumentum necessarium ad potionem herbarum ejusdem in pulverem redactæ, suavem gustu, nomine Chia. Est autem modus potionis ejusmodi: pulveris ejus, quantum uno juglandis putamine continetur, conjiciunt in fictile vas ex eorum genere, quæ procellana vulgus appellat. Inde calenti admodum aquâ dilutum ebibunt. Habent autem in eos usus ollam antiquissimæ operis ferreæ, figlinum poculum, cochlearia, infundibulum eluendo figlino, tripodem, foculum denique potioni caleficientiæ."—Letter from Japan, of L. Almeida, in Maffei's Litt. Select. ex India, Lib. iv.

1588. "Caeterum (apud Chineses) ex herba quadam expressus liquor admodum salutaris, nomine Chia, calidus hauritur, ut apud Iaponios."—Maffei, Hist. Ind., vi.

"Usum vitis ignorant (Japonii): oryza exprimunt vinum: Sed ipsi quodæ ante omnia delectantur haustibus aquæ poene ferventes, insperso quem supra diximus pulvere Chia. Circa eam potionem diligentissimi sunt, ac principes interdum viri ipsi manibus eidem temperandæ ac miscendæ, amicorum honoris causæ, 1598. "... the aforesaid warme water is made with the powder of a certaine hearbe called chaa."—Linschoten, 46.

1611. "Of the same fashion is the Cha of China, and taken in the same manner; except that the (Cha is the small leaf of a herb, from a certain plant brought from Tartary, which was shown me when I was at Malaca."—Teixeira, l. 19.

1626. "They use much the powder of a certaine Herbe called Chia, of which they put as much as a Walnut-shell may containe, into a dish of Porcelane, and drinke it with hot water."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 587.

1631. "Dur. You have mentioned the drink of the Chinese called Thee; what is your opinion thereof? . . . . Bont. . . . . The Chinese regard this beverage almost as something sacred . . . and they are not thought to have fulfilled the rites of hospitality to you until they have served you with it, just like the Mahometans with their Caveah. It is of a drying quality, and banishes sleep . . . it is beneficial to asthmatic and wheezing patients."—Jac. Bontius, Hist. Nat. et Med. Ind. Or., Lib. i. Dial. vi. p. 11.

1638. "Dans les assemblées ordinaires (à Sourat) que nous faisons tous les iours, nous ne prenions que du Thé, dont l'usage est fort commun par toutes les Indes."—Mandelslo, ed. Paris, 1659, p. 113.

1658. "Non mirum est, multos etiam nunc in illo errore versari, quasi diversae speciei plantae essent The et Tsia, cum e contra eadem sit, cujus decoctum Chinesibus The, Japonensibus Tsia nomen audit; licet horum Tsia, ob magnam contritionem et coctionem, nigrum The appellatur."—Bontii Hist. Nat. Pisonis Annot., p. 87.

1660. (September) "28th. . . . I did send for a cup of tea (a China drink) of which I had never drank before."—Pepys's Diary.

1667. (June) "28th. . . . Home and there find my wife making of tea; a drink which Mr. Pelling, the Potticary, tells her is good for her cold and defluxions."—Ibid.

1672. "There is among our people, and particularly among the womankind a great abuse of Thee, not only that too much is drunk . . . but this is also an evil custom to drink it with a full stomach; it is better and more wholesome to make use of it when the process of digestion is pretty well finished. . . . It is also a great folly to use sugar candy with Thee."—Baldaeus, Germ. ed. 179.

(This author devotes 5 columns to the subject of tea, and its use and abuse in India.)

1677. "Planta dicitur Chā, vel . . . Cīā, . . . cujus usus in Chinae claustris nescius in Europae quoque paulatim sese insinuare attentat. . . . Et quamvis Turcarum Cave et Mexicanorum Ciocolata eundem praestent effectum, Cīā tamen, quam nonnulli quoque Te vocant, ea multum superat," etc.—Kircher, China Illustr., 180.

1677. "Maer de Cīā (of Thee) sonder achtung op eenijde tijt te hebben, is novit schadelijk."—Vermeulen, 30.

1683. "Lord Russell . . . went into his chamber six or seven times in the morning, and prayed by himself, and then came out to Tillotson and me; he drunk a little tea and some sherry."—Burnet, Hist. of Own Time, Oxford ed. 1823, ii. 375.

1683. "Venus her Myrtle, Phœbus has his Bays; Tea both excels which She* vouchsafes to praise, The best of Queens, and best of Herbs we owe To that bold Nation which the Way did show To the fair Region where the Sun does rise, Whose rich Productions we so justly prize."—Waller.

1726. "I remember well how in 1681 I for the first time in my life drank thee at the house of an Indian Chaplain, and how I could not understand how sensible men could think it a treat to drink what tasted no better than hay-water."—Valentijn, v. 190.

1789. "And now her vase a modest Naiad fills With liquid crystal from her pebbly rills; Piles the dry cedar round her silver urn, (Bright climbs the blaze, the crackling faggots burn). Culls the green herb of China's envy'd bowers, In gaudy cups the steamy treasure pours; And sweetly smiling, on her bended knee, Presents the fragrant quintessence of Tea."

Darwin, Botanic Garden, Loves of the Plants, Canto ii.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (Tea), Bohea. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Bu-i) Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-keen, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawford points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea, To muse, and spill her solitary tea."

Epistle to Mrs. Teresa Blount.

1711. "There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohea Tea to be sold at 26s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southampton Street in the Strand."—Advt. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

 "Oh had I rather unadmired remained On some lone isle or distant northern land;
 Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
 Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste
 bohea."

Belinda, in Rape of the Lock, iv. 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohay. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market.

The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711. "Bohea is of little Worth among the Moors and Gentoos of India, Arrabs and Persians . . . that of 45 Tale would not fetch the Price of green Tea of 10 Tale a Pecull."—Lockyer, 116.

1721.
 "Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,

On odorif'rous plains the leaves do grow, Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame,

Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name."

Allan Ramsay's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 213-4.

1726. "Anno 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts . . . Congo . . . Pego . . . , Tongge, Rosmaryn, Tea, rare and very dear."—Valentijn, iv. 14.

1727. "In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm dry Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea."—A. Ham. ii. 289.

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Thee gives Thee Bohea as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade names, according to Zedler, were Thee-Peco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucon best of all.

2. (Tea), Campoy, a black tea also. Kam-pui, the Canton pron. of the characters Kien-pei, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (Tea) Congou (a black tea). This is Kang-hu (tê) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fu, 'work or labour.'

4. Hyson (a green tea). This is He-hei and ai in the south - ch'un = 'bright-spring,' characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Le, who was in the trade in the dist. of Hui-ning (S.W. of Hang-chau) about 1700; others say that He-chun was Le's daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson.

c. 1772.

"And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair patterns of her beauty, hath ordained
 Celestial Tea;—a fountain that can cure
 The ills of passion, and can free from frowns.

To her, ye fair! in adoration bow!
 Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve,
 Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant board
 With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congo crown'd."

5. Oolong (bl. tea). Wu-lung = "black dragon"; respecting which there is a legend to account for the name.

6. Pekoe (do). Pak-ho, Canton pron. of characters pôh-hao = "white-down."

7. Pouchong (do). Pao-chung = 'fold-sort.' So-called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-souchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places pre-pare and pack it.

8. Souchong (do.) Siu-chung—Canton for Siao-chung = "little-sort."

1781. "Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thé connus sous les noms de thé bouy, thé vert, et thé saathon."—Sonnerat, ii. 249.

9. Twankay (green tea). From T'un-k'i, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chau-fu in Ngan-hwei.* Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for 'tea.'

10. Young Hyson. This is called by the Chinese Yü-t'sien = "rain-before," or "Yu-before," because picked before Kuh-yu, a term falling about 20th April. According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Uchain, which seems to represent the Chinese name.

In an "Account of the Prices at which Teas have been put up to Sale, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785" (MS. India Office Records), the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):—

"Bohea Tea.
Congou, Souchong,

Singlo (?), Hyson."

Tea-caddy, s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawford suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.) A 'catty-box,' meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.)

A friend adds the remark that in his youth 'Tea-caddy' was a Londoner's name for Harley Street, due to the number of E. I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.

Teapoy, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connexion with tea, and hence, in London shops for japanned ware and the like, a teapoy means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous.

Tipāi is a Hindustāni, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustāni word for a tripod, of hybrid etymology, from Hind. tin = 3, and Pers. pāe, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is sipāi (properly sihpāya), and the legitimate Hindi word tirpad or tripad, but tipāi or tepay was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from inaccuracy, possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word, seapoy.

The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any very small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry.

Sihpāya occurs in 'Alī of Yezd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging the Indus (Felliot, iii. 482).

1844. "Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd;—and the old gentleman chuckled,—'most odd to find a person who don't know what a tepay is . . . Well, then, a tepay or tinpay is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right.'

'Why, that table has four legs,' cried Peregrine.

'It's a tepay all the same,' said Mr. Havethelacks.'—Peregrine Pultuney, i. 112.

Teak, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to Botanists as Tectona grandis, L., N. O. Verbenaceae. The word is the Malayālam tekku. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pegu being the other.

The Sansk. name of the tree is sāka, whence the modern Hind. name sāgun or sāgun and the Mahr. sāg. From this last probably was taken sāj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the σαγαλίνα of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sāgalī, 'made of teak—belonging to teak.' The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great palace of the Sassanid Kings at Seleucia or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskāl, quoted by Royle (Hindu Medicine, 128).

The gopher-wood of Genesis is translated sāj in the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Royle).

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber (which however is indexless), and the only mention we can find in the Ain, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name "Sāgaun" has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann's E. T. i., p. 228).

c. A.D. 80. "In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apologos, lying near Pasine Charax and the river Euphrates.

"Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 6 days you reach another port of Persia called Omana. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these Ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (ξύλων σαγαλίνων και δοκῶν), and horns, and spars of shisham (σασαμίνων), and of ebony. . . ."—Peripl. Maris Erythr., § 35-36.

c. 800. (under Harun al Rashid) "Faḡl continued his story ' . . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . they told me he had been struck with the judām, that his body was swollen and all black . . . . I went to Rashid to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies . . . I myself said the funeral prayer. As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together; an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (sāj) . . . .—Quotation in Mas'ūdi, Prairies d'Or, vi. 298–299.

c. 880. “From Kol to Sindān, where they collect teak-wood (sāj) and cane, 18 far-sakhs.”—Im Khurādāda, in J. As., S. VI., tom. v. 284.

c. 940. “. . . The teak-tree (sāj). This tree, which is taller than the date-palm, and more bulky than the walnut, can shelter under its branches a great number of men and cattle, and you may judge of its dimensions by the logs that arrive, of their natural length, at the depôts of Basra, of Irak, and of Egypt . . .”—Mas'ūdi, iii. 12.

Before 1200. “Abu'l-dhali the Sindian, describing the regions of Hind, has these verses :

* * * *

“By my life ! it is a land where, when the rain falls, Jacinths and pearls spring up for him who wants ornaments.
There too are produced musk and camphor and ambergris and agila,*

* * * *

And ivory there, and teak (al-sāj) and aloeswood and sandal . . .”

Quoted by Kazwini, in Gildemeister, 217–218.

The following order, in a King's Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber :

1597. “We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Achem (Achin), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Achem.”—In Archiv. Port. Oriental, fasc. ii. 669.

1602. “. . . It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the town, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (teca), which is a wood not subject to decay . . . .”—Sousa, Oriente Conquistado (1710), ii. 265.

1631. Bontius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title “Quercus Indica, Kiati Malais dicta.”—Lib. vi. cap. 16.

On this Rheedee, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Hortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kiati but Jati. Kiati seems to be a mistake of some kind growing out of Kayu-jati, ‘Teak-wood.’

1644. “Hã nestas terras de Damam muyta e boa madeyra de Teça, a melhor de toda a India, e tambem de muyta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy facil de laurar he perduravel, e particularmente nam lhe tocando agoa.”—Bocarro, MS.

1675. “At Cock-crow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teke (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Bee-hive.”—Fryer, 142.

“. . . Teke by the Portuguese, Sogwan by the Moors, is the firmest Wood they have for Building . . . in Height the lofty Pine exceeds it not, nor the sturdy Oak in Bulk and Substance . . . This Prince of the Indian Forest was not so attractive, though mightily glorious, but that . . .”—Ibid. 178.

1727. “Gundavee is next, where good Quantities of Teak Timber are cut, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships.”—A. Ham., i. 178.

1744. “Tecka is the name of a costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays.”—Zeidler, Univ. Lexicon, s.v.

1759. “They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timbers also, but they lying in a swampy place, could not take fire.”—Capt. Alves, Report on Loss of Negrats, in Dalrymple, i. 349.

c. 1760. “As to the wood it is a sort called Teak, to the full as durable as oak.”—Grose, i. 108.

1777. “Experience hath long since shewn, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of teke-wood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts.”—Price's Tracts, i. 191.

1793. “The teek forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship timber, lie along the western side of the Gaut mountains . . . on the north and north-east of Basseen . . . I cannot close this subject without remarking the unpardonable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas.”—Rennell, Memoir, 3d ed. 260.

Tee, s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chatras or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burmese h'ti, an umbrella.

1800. "... In particular the Tee, or umbrella, which, composed of open iron-work, crowned the spire, had been thrown down."—Symes, i. 193.

1855. "... gleaming in its white plaster, with numerous pinnacles and tall central spire, we had seen it (Gaudapalen Temple at Pagan) from far down the Irawadi rising like a dim vision of Milan Cathedral . . . It is cruciform in plan . . . exhibiting a massive basement with porches, and rising above in a pyramidal gradation of terraces, crowned by a spire and htee. The latter has broken from its stays at one side, and now leans over almost horizontally . . ."—Mission to Ava, 1858, p. 42.

1876. "... a feature known to Indian archaeologists as a Tee . . ."—Fergusson, Ind. and East. Archit., 64.

Teek, adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious. Used in N. India. Hind. thik.

Tehr, Tair, &c., s. The wild-goat of the Ilīmālaya; Hemitragus jemlicus, Jerdon. In Nepaul it is called Jhūral.

Tejpat, s. See Malabathrum.

1833. "Last night as I was writing a long description of the tēz-pāt, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pickles beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the Laurus nobilis . . ."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872. Tejpat is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Govinda Sāmanta, i. 223.

Telinga, n.p. H. Tilangā. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the middle ages, Tiliṅgānu or Tilangānu, sometimes Tiling or Tilang. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Triliṅga, the habitual application of Tri-Kaṅga, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Tilinga, and the example of actual use of Triliṅga, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, 2d ed., Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article Kling in this book).

A.D. c. 150. "Τρίγλυντον, το καὶ Τρίλιγγον Βασίλειον . . . κ. τ. λ."—Ptolemy, vi. 23.

1309. "On Saturday the 10th of Sha'bān, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islām might be planted and flourish in the soil of Tilang, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force . . . When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal,* the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 80.

1321. "In the year 721 H. the Sultān (Ghiyāsu-d-dīn) sent his eldest son, Ulugh Khān, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Tilang."—Zicu-d-din Burni, in do, 231.

c. 1335. "For every mile along the road there are three dāvāt (post stations) . . . and so the road continues for six months' marching, till one reaches the countries of Tiling and Ma'bar . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 192.

"In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Dehli, given by Shihāb ud-dīn Dimishki, we find both Talang and Talanj, probably through some mistake."—Notices et Extraits, xiii., Pt. 1, 170-171.

c. 1590. "Sūba Berūr . . . Its length from Batāla (or Pitala) to Bairāgarh is 200 kuroh (or kos); its breadth from Bidar to Hindia 180. On the east of Bairāgarh it marches with Bastar; on the north with Hindia; on the south with Tilingāna; on the west with Mahkarabad. . . ."—Ain (orig.) i. p. 476.

1608. "In the southern lands of India since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i. e. Mahommedans) conquered Magadha, many abodes of Learning were founded; and though they were inconsiderable, the continuance of instruction and exorcism was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Trilinga."—Turamath's H. of Buddhism (Germ. Tr. of Schiefner), p. 264. See also 116, 158, 166.

Telinga, s. This term in the last century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with Sepoy, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion; no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz., Madras.

1758. "... the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and accoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Talingas."—Scir Mutaqherin, ii. 92.

c. 1760. "... Sepoys, sometimes called Telingas."—Grose, in his Glossary, see vol. I. xiv.

1760. "300 Telingees are run away, and entered into the Beerboom Rajah's service."—In Louy, 235; see also 236, 237, and (1761) p. 258, "Tellingars."

1786. "... Gardi (see Gardee), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal . . . where they are stiled Talingas, because the first Sipahies that came in Bengal (and they were imported in 1757 by Colonel (Clive) were all Talingas or Telougous born . . . speaking hardly any language but their native . . ."—Note by Tr. of Seir Mutaqherin, ii. 93.

c. 1805. "The battalions, according to the old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts . . . 1883. "We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive's army were known to the Bengalis of Nuddea as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras."—Saty. Review, Jan. 29th, p. 120.

Teloogoo, n. p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is "spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicat," (24 m. N. of Madras) "where it supersedes Tamil, to Chica-cole, where it begins to yield to the Oriya, and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Marátha country and Mysore, including within its range the 'Ceded Districts' and Karnúl, a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam . . . and a portion of the Nágpúr country and Gondvána."—Bp. Caldwell's Dravid. Gram. Introd. p. 29.

Telugu is the name given to the language by the people themselves,* as the language of Telingána (q.v.). It is this language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is still, called Gentoo at Madras.

1673. "Their Language they call generally Gentu . . . the peculiar name of their speech is Teliga."—Fryer, 33.

1793. "The Tellinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Pennar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance."—Bennett, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [cxi].

Tembool, s. Betel-leaf. Sansk. tāmbūla, adopted in Persian as tambūl and in Arab. al-tambūl.

1298. "All the people of this city, as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called tembul . . ."—Marco Polo, ii. 358.

1563. "Only you should know that Avicenna calls the betre (betel) tembul, which seems a word somewhat corrupted, since everybody pronounces it tambul, and not tembul."—Garcia, f. 37 h.

Tenasserim, n. p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irawadi, after the war of 1824-26, these were officially known as "the Martaban and Tenasserim Provinces," or often as "the Tenasserim Provinces." We have the name probably from the Malay form Tanassari. We do not know to what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-nen-thá-ri.

c. 1430. "Relicta Taprobane ad urbem Tenasserim supra ostium fluvii eodem nomine vocitati diebus XVI tempestate actus est. Quae regio et elephantis et verzano ('brazil-wood') abundat."—Nic. Conti, in Poggio de Varietate Fortunae, lib. iv.

1506. "At Tenazar grows all the revi (brazil), and it costs 1½ ducats the baar, equal to 4 kantars. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence come pepper, cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmeg, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten . . . This is indeed the first mart for spices in India."—Leonardo da Massar, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 28.

1510. "The City of Tarnassari is situated near to the sea, etc."—Varthema, 196.

This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coronandel.

Teraí, Terye, s. Hind. tarāī, 'moist (land)' from tar, 'moist' or 'green.' The term is especially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himmālaya north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture, which has sunk into the talus of porous material, exudes.

A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bhāgalpūr, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terye (q.v.)

1793. "Helloura, though standing very little below the level of Cheeria Ghat's top, is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepaul . . . Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepaul, as well as the low tract bordering immediately on the Company's northern frontier."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul (1811), p. 40.

1824. "Mr. Boulderson said he was sorry to learn from the raja that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over . . . I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsook these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively deserts them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain . . . and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 250-251.

Thermantidote, s. This learned word ("heat-antidote") was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32, to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and incased in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1831. "To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, ice-water, and the thermantidote, which answers admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d, I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned . . . by standing or sleeping before it."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 208.

1840. ". . . The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tatties, phermantidotes,* and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Ranjeet Singh, 132.

1853. ". . . then came punkahs by day, and next punkahs by night, and then tatties, and then therm-antidotes, till at last May came round again, and found the unhappy Anglo-Indian world once more surrounded with all the necessary but uncomfortable sweltering panoply of the hot weather."—Oakfield, i. 263-4.

1878. "They now began (c. 1840) to have the benefit of thermantidotes, which however were first introduced in 1831; the name of the inventor is not recorded."—Calcutta Rev., cxxiv. p. 718.

Thug, s. Hind. thag (Mahr. thal), 'a cheat, a swindler.' And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in * This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was innocent of this quaint error.

R. Drummond's Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c. (1808). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson: "Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sullying forth in a gang . . . and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their turbans or handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and burying their bodies." The proper specific designation of these criminals was p'hānsigār, from p'hānsi, 'a noose.'

According to Mackenzie (in As. Res. xiii.) the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Surat.

The Phānsigārs (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, "The English in India," which one of the present writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1826 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar, not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman's book "Ramaseena;" or a Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression," Calcutta, 1836; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxiv. 357). One of Col. Meadows Taylor's Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839) has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir William (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck.

1673. "They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts, . . . they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that winding it about their Necks, they pulled them from the Hedges and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had . . . they were sentenced to Laé Talibania, to be hanged; wherefore being delivered to the Galat or Sheriff's Men, they led them two Miles with Hopes round their Necks to some Wild Dunes: In their way thither they were cheerful, and went singing, and smoking Tobacco . . . as jolly as if going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were only 14 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men . . ."—Fryer, 97.

Tibet, n. p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land* of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which may be said roughly to extend from the Indus elbow, N. W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see Sling) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a length of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahomedans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the ninth century.

Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of these was (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Couperie), Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so-called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R., (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 5th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a state to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tibet, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkestan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroboration from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpini and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhimor several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidt), Tubet and Töböt.

c. 930. "This country has been named Tibbat because of the establishment there of the Himyarites, the word thabrt signifying to fix or establish oneself. This etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that Di'bal, son of 'Alī-al-Khuzā'i, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumair he exalts the descendants of Kaṭṭān above those of Nizāar, saying:—

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Merv,
And who were writers at the gate of Chin,
'Tis they who have bestowed on Samar-kand the name of Shamr,
And who have transported thither the Tibetans" (Al-Tabbatina).*

* A friend objects to this application of 'table-land' to so rugged a region of inequalities. But it is a technical expression in geography, applicable to a considerable area, of which the lowest levels are at a considerable height above the sea. The objection was anticipated by the British soldier in the Abyssinian expedition: 'Call this a table-land? Then it's a table with the legs uppermost!'

Tical, s. This (tikāl) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and it is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This weight is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the viss (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about 1½ rupee in value. The origin of the word tikāl is doubtful. Sir A. Phayre suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese words ta-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian ṭakā (see tucka). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bat. In Siam the tical is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 225½ grs. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.

1688. "The proportion of their (Siamese) Money to ours is, that their Tical, which weighs no more than half a Crown, is yet worth three shillings and three half-pence."—La Loubère, Eng. tr., p. 72.

c. 1759. ". . . a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tical (little more than ½ a Crown)."—In Dalrymple, Or. Repert., i. 121.

1775. Stevens, New and Complete Guide to E. I. Trade, gives

"Pegu weight:
100 moo = 1 Tual (read Tical).
100 tual (tical) = 1 vis = 3 lb. 5 oz. 5 dr. avr.

150 vis = 1 candy."
And under Siam:
"80 Tuals (ticals) = 1 catty.
50 Catties = 1 Pecul."

1783. "The merchandize is sold for teecalls, a round piece of silver, stamped and weighing about one rupee and a quarter."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, p. vii.

Ticca, and vulg. Ticker, adj. This is applied to any person or thing engaged by the job, or on contract. Thus a ticca garry is a hired carriage, a ticca doctor is a surgeon not in the regular service but temporarily engaged by Government. From Hind. thikā or thikah, 'hire, fare, fixed price.'

1827. "A Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William in Bengal, and for regulating the number and fare of Teeka Palankeens, and Teeka Bearers in the Town of Calcutta . . . registered in the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the 27th June, 1827."—Bengal Regulations of 1827.

1878. "Leaving our servants to jabber over our heavier baggage, we got into a 'ticea gharry,' 'hired trap,' a bit of civilization I had hardly expected to find so far in the Mofussil."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 94.

Ticky-tock. This is an unmeaning refrain used in some French songs, and by foreign singing masters in their scales. It would appear from the following quotation to be of Indian origin.

c. 1755. "These gentry (the band with nautch-girls) are called Tickytau boys, from the two words Ticky and Tau, which they continually repeat, and which they chaunt with great vehemence."—Ives, 75.

Tiffin, s. Luncheon, Anglo-Indian and Hindustani, at least in English households. Also to Tiff, v. to take luncheon. Some have derived this familiar word from Ar. tafannun, 'diversion, amusement,' but without history, or evidence of such an application of the Arabic word. Others have derived it from Chinese ch'ih-fan, 'eat-rice,' which is only an additional example that anything whatever may be plausibly resolved into Chinese monosyllables.

We believe the word to be a local survival of an English colloquial or slang term. Thus we find in the Lexicon Balatronicum, compiled originally by Capt. Grose (1785): "Tiffing, eating or drinking out of meal-times," besides other meanings. Wright (Dict. of Obsolete and Provincial English) has: "Tiff, s. (1) a draught of liquor, (2) small beer;" and Mr. Davies (Supplemental English Glossary) gives some good quotations both of this substantive and of a verb "to tiff," in the sense of 'take off a draught.' We should conjecture that Grose's sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffing" was a participial noun from the verb to tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the said participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffing" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to tiff."

Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Toddy and the like he says:

"Homines autem qui eas (potiones) colligunt ac praeeparant, dicuntur Portugallico nomine Tiffadores, atque opus ipsum Tiffar; nostratibus Belgis tyfferen" (Herb. Amboinense, i. 5).

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India. We now give examples of the various uses:

Tiff, s. In the old English senses, (in which it occurs also in the form tip, and is probably allied to tipple and tipsy).

(1) For a draught:

1758. "Monday . . . Seven. Returned to my room. Made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine."—Journal of a Senior Fellow, in the Idler, No. 33.

(2) For small beer:

1604.

" . . . make waste more prodigal
Than when our beer was good, that John may float
To Styx in beer, and lift up Charon's boat
With wholesome waves: and as the conduits ran
With claret at the Coronation,
So let your channels flow with single tiff,
For John I hope is crown'd . . ."
On John Dawson, Butler of Christ Church, in Bishop Corbet's Poems, ed. 1807, pp. 207-8.

To Tiff, v. in the sense of taking off a draught.

1812.

"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."
Combe, Dr. Syntax, I. Canto v.
(This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

Tiffin (the Indian substantive).

1810. "The (Mahommedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in tiffins (slight repasts), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, Vade Mecum, i. 352.

" (published 1812) "The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home."—Maria Graham, 29.

1811. "Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who . . . detailed the delights of India, and the routine of its day; the changing linen, the curry-combing . . . the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay tiffings, were all delightful to her in reciting . . .”—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, by Lactitia Maria Hawkins, ii. 12.

1824. “The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin . . .”—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iii.

c. 1832. “Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian Uncle . . . everybody has an Indian Uncle . . . He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking tiffin; and such a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon: but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin.”—De Quincy, Casuistry of Roman Meals, in Works, iii. 259.

1847. “‘Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin,’ a voice cried behind him, as a pudgy hand was laid on his shoulder. . . But the Captain had no heart to go a-feasting with Joe Sedley.”—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 235.

1850. “A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants . . . may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman.”—Sir C. Napier, Farewell Address.

1882. “The last and most vulgar form of ‘nobbling’ the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotel-keepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale . . .”—Saty. Review, March 25th, 1857.

To Tiff, in the Indian sense.

1803. “He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to tiff at Floyer’s. After tiffin Close said he should be glad to go.”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 116.

1814. “We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to tiff on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After tiffing, I was cold and unwell.”—Ibid., p. 283.

Tiffing here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun tiffin would be originally formed.

1816. “The huntsman now informed them all They were to tiff at Bobbry Hall. Mounted again, the party starts, Upsets the hackeries and carts, Hammals and palanquins and doolies, Dobies and burrawas (?) and coolies.”

The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Ht, by Quiz (Canto viii.).

1829. “I was tiffing with him one day, when the subject turned on the sagacity of elephants . . .”—John Shupp, ii. 267.

1859. “Go home, Jack. I will tiff with you to-day at half-past two.”—J. Lang, Wanderings in India, p. 16.

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Anglo-Indian use:

1885. “‘Look here, RANDOLPH, don’t you know,’ said Sir PEEL, . . . ‘Here you’ve been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and tiffing with Rajahs. . . .’”—Punch, Essence of Parliament, April 25th, p. 204.

Tiger, s. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin typhs, tigris, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, tigra, which gives the modern P. (and Hind.) tīr.* Pliny says of the River Tigris: “a celeritate Tigris incipit vocari. Ita appellat Medi sagittam” (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its “velocitatis, tremendae,” Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour.

c. B.C. 325. “The Indians think the Tiger (ὄντι γρύ) a great deal stronger than the elephant. Nearchus says he saw the skin of a tiger, but did not see the beast itself, and that the Indians assert the tiger to be as big as the biggest horse; whilst in swiftness and strength there is no creature to be compared to him. And when he engages the elephant he springs on its head, and easily throttles it. Moreover, the creatures which we have seen and call tigers are only jackals which are dappled, and of a kind bigger than ordinary jackals."—Arrian, Indica, xv.

* Sir H. Rawlinson gives tigra as old Persian for an arrow (see Herod. vol. iii. p. 552). Vullers seems to consider it rather an induction than a known word for an arrow. He says: “Besides the name of that river (Tigris) Arvand, which often occurs in the Shāhnāma, and which properly signifies ‘running’ or ‘swift’; another Medo-persic name Tigra is found in the cuneiform inscriptions, and is cognate with the Zend word tedjao, tedjerem, and Pehlvi tedjora, &c., ‘a running river,’ which is entered in Anquetil’s vocabulary. And these, along with the Pers. teg ‘an arrow,’ tegh ‘a sword,’ tekh and teg ‘sharp,’ are to be referred to the Zend root tikhsh, Skt. tij, ‘to sharpen.’ The Pers word tīr, ‘an arrow,’ may be of the same origin, since its primitive form appears to be tigra, from which it seems to come by elision of the g, as the Skt. tīr, ‘arrow,’ comes from tīra for tigra, where v seems to have taken the place of g. From the word tigra . . . seem also to be derived the usual names of the river Tigris, Pers. Dishla, Ar. Dylah” (Vullers, s.v. tīr).

We apprehend that this big dappled jackal (θώς) is meant for a hyaena.

c. B.C. 322. "In the island of Tylos . . . there is also another wonderful thing they say . . . for there is a certain tree, from which they cut sticks, and these are very handsome articles, having a certain variegated colour, like the skin of a tiger. The wood is very heavy; but if it is struck against any solid substance it shivers like a piece of pottery."—Theophrastus, Hist. of Plants, Bk. V. c. 4.

c. B.C. 321. "And Ulpianus . . . said: Do we anywhere find the word used as a masculine, τὸν τίγριν? for I know that Philemon says thus in his Neæra:

'A. We've seen the tigriss (τὸν τίγριν) that Seleucus sent us;
Are we not bound to send Seleucus back
Some beast in fair exchange?'"

In Athenæus, xiii. 57.

c. B.C. 320. "According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prasii, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its hinder leg, overpowered it, and dragged it to him."—Strabo, xv. ch. 1, § 37 (Hamilton and Falconer's E. T., iii. 97).

c. B.C. 19. "And Augustus came to Samos, and again passed the winter there . . . and all sorts of embassies came to him; and the Indians who had previously sent messages proclaiming friendship, now sent to make a solemn treaty, with presents, and among other things including tigers, which were then seen for the first time by the Romans; and if I am not mistaken, by the Greeks also."—Dio Cassius, Bk. liv. 9.

c. B.C. 19.
" . . . duris genuit te cautibus horrens Caucasus, Hyrcanaeque admōrunt ubera tigres." Aen. iv. 366-7.

c. A.D. 70. "The Emperor Augustus . . . in the yeere that Q. Tubero and Fabius Maximus were Consuls together . . . was the first of all others that shewed a tame tygre within a cage: but the Emperour Claudius foure at once . . . Tygres are bred in Hircania and India: this beast is most dreadful for incomparable swiftness."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, i. 204.

c. 80-90. "Wherefore the land is called Dachsenabades, for the South is called Dachsenos in their tongue. And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τίγρεις) and elephants, and immense serpents (ἐράκοντες) and hyenas (κροκόττας) and cynocephala of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 50.

c. A.D. 180. "That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martiora (Martichōra), and by the Greeks Androphagus (Man-eater), I am convinced is really the tiger (τὸν τίγριν). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp prickles at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer,—the tale handed about by the Indians,—I don't believe to be true, but only to have been generated by the excessive fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour;—no doubt when they see him in the bright sun-light he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, IX. xxi. 4.

1298. "Enchore sachiés qe le Grant Sire a bien leopars asez qe tuit sunt bon da chacer et da prendre bestes . . . Il ha plosors Lyons grandismes, greignors asez qe cele de Babilonie. Il sunt de mout biaux poil et de mout biaux coleor, car il sunt tout verges por long, noir et vermoil et blance. Il sunt afaités a prandre sengler sauvages et les bueff sauvages, et orses et asnes sauvages et cerf et cavriolz et autres bestes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. xcii.

Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and red and white, as of a Lion. And a medieval Bestiary has a chapter on the Tigre which begins: "Une Beste est qui est apelée Tigre, c'est une maniere de serpent."—(In Cahier et Martin, Mélanges d'Archéol. ii. 140).

1474. "This meane while there came in certain men sent from a Prince of India, wth certain strange beastes, the first whereof was a leonna ledde in a chayne by one that had skylly, which they call in their language Babureth. She is like unto a lyonesse; but she is redde coloured, streaked all over wth blacke strykes; her face is redde wth certain white and blacke spots, the bealy white, and tayed like the lyon: seemyng to be a marvailouse fiers beast."—Josafa Barbaro. Hak. Soc., pp. 53-54.

Here again is an excellent description of a tiger, but that name seems unknown to the traveller. Babureth is in the Italian original Baburth, Pers. babr, a tiger.

1553. " . . . Beginning from the point of Cingapura and all the way to Pullo-camblam, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malaca . . . there is no other town with a name except this City of Malaca, only some havens of fishermen, and in the interior a very few villages. And indeed the most of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires that they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are so numerous that many come into the city itself at night in search of prey. And it has happened, since we took the place, that a tiger leapt into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence. and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the heels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."*—Barros, II. vi. 1.

1583. "We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts" (the Pegu delta) "and prey on whatever they can get at. And although we were on that account anchored in midstream, nevertheless it was asserted that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 94 v.

1586. "We went through the wilderness because the right way was full of thieves, when we passed the country of Gouren, where we found but few Villages, but almost all Wilderness, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere, Grasse longer than a man, and very many Tigris."—L. Fitch, in Purchas, ii. 1736.

1675. "Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Combies, the Body tied to a long Bamboo, the Tail extended . . . it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail, Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat . . . the Visage Fierce and Majestick, the Teeth gnashing . . ."—Fryer, 176.

1869. "Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des pîrs (see Peer): aussi les naturels du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 24.

Tincall, s. Borax. Pers. tinkār, but apparently originally Sansk. ṭaṇṭāna, and perhaps from the people so-called who may have supplied it, in the Himalaya—Tayyavot of Ptolemy.

1563. "It is called borax and crisocola; and in Arabic tincar, and so the Guzeratis call it . . ."—Garcia, f. 78.

c. 1590. "Having reduced the k'haral to small bits, he adds to every man of it 1½ seers of tangār (borax) and 3 seers of pounded natrum, and kneads them together."—Ain, i. 26.

Tindal, s. Malayāl. taṇḍal, Telug. taṇḍelu, also in Mahr. and other vernaculars taṇḍel, the head or commander of a body of men. But in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascars, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1348. "The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailukari this princess invited the nākhodah or owner of the ship, the kavāni (see Cranny) or clerk, the merchants, the persons of distinction, the tandil . . ."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.

The Moorish traveller explains the word as mukaddam al-rajāl, which the French translators render as "général des piétons," but we may hazard the correction of "Master of the crew." (See a foot-note s.v. Mocuddum).

c. 1590. "In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nākhudā, or owner of the ship . . . 3. The Tandil, or chief of the khalāris or sailors (see Classy) . . ."—Ain, i. 280.

1673. "The Captain is called Nucquedah, the boatswain Tindal . . ."—Fryer, 107.

1758. "One Tindal, or corporal of Lascars."—Orme, ii. 339.

Tinnevely, n. p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tiru-nel-vēli, 'Sacred Rice-hedge,' or 'Sacred Bamboo-hedge.'

The District formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura Kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawāb of Arcot (Culdrwell, II. of Tinnevely).

Tiparry, s. Beng. tipārī or tepārī, the fruit of Physalis peruviana, L., N. O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as 'Cape gooseberry,' and sometimes as 'Brazil cherry.' It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (pūra). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam.

We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word tenpā, 'inflated,' which gives a name to a species of tetrodon or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner.

The native name of the fruit in N. W. India is māko, but tipārī is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian Island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

* Lest I am doing the great historian wrong as to this Munchausen-like story, I give the original: "E já aconteceo . . . saltar hum tigre em hum quintal cercado de madeira bem alto, e levou hum tronco de madeira com trez (tres?) escravos que estavam prezos nelle, com os quaes saltou de claro em claro por cima da cerca."

1845. "On Makin they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives 'teiparu'; this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste."—U. S. Expedition, by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

1878. "... The enticing tipari in its crackly covering . . ."—In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

Tipoo Sahib, n. p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipu Sultan, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad.

Tirkut, s. Foresail. Sea Hind. from Port. triquete (Roebuck).

Tiyan, n. p. Malayäl. Tiyan, or Tivan, pl. Tiyar or Tivar. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) in Malabar. The word signifies "Islander"; and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon.

1510. "The third class of Pagans are called Tiva, who are artizans."—Varthema, 142.

1516. "The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tivas (read Tivas), who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything . . . for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 335.

Tobacco, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

c. 1550. "It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabacco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and stinking smoke, I was obliged to go away in haste, and seek some other place."—Girolamo Benzoni, Hak. Soc., p. 81.

1585. "Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indicum illam plantam quam Tabaccam vocant et Nicotiam, qua contra cruditates ab Indis edocti, usi erant, in Angliam primi, quod suam, intulerunt. Ex illo sane tempore usu coepit esse creberrimo, et magno pretio, dum quam plurimi graveolentem illius fumum, alii lascivientes, alii valetudini consulentes, per tubulum testaceum inexplibili aviditate passim pauriunt, et mox e naribus efflant; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccanae non minus quam cerisiariae et vinariae passim per oppida habeantur. Ut Anglorum corpora (quod salse ille dixit) qui hac plantâ tantopere delectantur in Barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur; quum iisdem quibus Barbari delectentur et sanari se posse credant."—Gul. Camdeni, Annal. Rerum Anglicanum. . . regn. Elizabetha, ed. 1717, ii. 449.

"Into the woods thence forth in haste shee went
To seeke for hearbes that mote him remedy;
For shee of herbes had great intendiment,
Taught of the Nymphe which from her infancy
Her nourced had in true Nobility:
This whether yt divine Tobacco were,
Or Panachaea, or Polygony,
Shee fownd, and brought it to her patient deare
Who al this while lay bleding out his hart-blood neare."

The Faerie Queen, III., v. 32.

1597. "His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villafranca) "made no answer, but called for tobacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took tobacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting."—Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1598. "Cob. Ods me I marle what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoke and embers: there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the bell went for yesternight; one of them they say will never scape it; he voided a bushel of soot yesterday upward and downward . . . it's little better than rats-bane or rosaker."—Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

1604. "Oct. 19. Demise to Tho. Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Impost of 6s. 8d., and the old Custom of 2d. per pound on tobacco."—Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1605. "In Bijápúr I had found some tobacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work. . . . His Majesty (Akbar) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appurtenances: he expressed great surprise and examined the tobacco, which was made up in pipefuls; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khán-i-'Azam replied: 'This is tobacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pipeful. He began to smoke it, when his physician approached and forbade his doing so" (omitting much that is curious). "As I had brought a large supply of tobacco and pipes, I sent some to several of the nobles, while others sent to ask for some; indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly. His Majesty, however, did not adopt it."—Asad Beg, in Elliot, vi. 165-167.

1610. "The Turkes are also incredible takers of Opium . . . carrying it about them both in peace and in warre; which they say expelleth all feare, and makes them courageous; but I rather think giddy headed . . . And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have ioyned vnto them great heads of wood to containe it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes lookt into (for Morat Bassa not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turke, and so to be led in derision through the Citie,) no question but it would prove a principall commodity. Nevertheless they will take it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doth passe here amongst them for most excellent."—Sandys, Journey, 66.

1615. "Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di pigliar in conversazione per gusto: ma io non ho voluto mai provarne, e ne avera cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinale Crescenzo qualche volta per medicamento insegnatogli dal Signor don Virginio Orsino, che primo di tutti, se io non fallo, gli anni addietro lo portò in Roma d'Inghilterra."—P. della Valle, i. 76.

1616. "Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures al sorts of diseases (which neuer any drugges could do before) in all persons and at all times. . . . It cures the gout in the feet, and (which is miraculous) in that very instant when the smoke thereof, as light, flies vp into the head, the virtue thereof, as heavy, runs down to the little toe. It helps all sorts of agues. It refreshes a weary man, and yet makes a man hungry. Being taken when they goe to bed, it makes one sleepe soundly, and yet being taken when a man is sleepe and drousie, it will, as they say, awake his braine, and quicken his vnderstanding. . . . O omnipotent power of Tobacco! And if it could by the smoake thereof chase out devils, as the smoake of Tobias fish did (which I am sure could smell no stronger) it would serve for a precious Relicke, both for the Superstitious Priests, and the insolent Puritanes, to cast out devils withall."—K. James I., Counterblaste to Tobacco, in Works, pp. 219-220.

1617. "As the smoking of tobacco (tambakû) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Shâh 'Abbâs, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Irân. But Khân-i-'Alam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and oftensmoked."—Memoirs of Jahângir, in Elliot, vi. 851.

1623. "Incipit nostro seculo in immensum crescere usus tobacco, atque afficit homines occulta quidem delectatione, ut qui illi semel assueti sint, difficile postea abstinant."—Bacon, H. Vitae et Mortis, in B. Montague's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Yule, written in India about the beginning of this century: †

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medicinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, its rarity prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal, within a short period after its introduction into Hindostaun; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehaun (commenced A.H. 1037) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, nay even often over the necessaries of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So rooted was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this deleterious Plant! Nature recoils at the very idea of touching the Saliva of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pass the moistened Tube from one mouth to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acrid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connoisseur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of radical Heat. Without doubt the Hookah is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Counsellor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Apartments: it gives joy to the Beholder in our public Halls. The Music of its sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the Fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with extatic delight. . . .” (cetera desunt).

* See the same passage rendered by Blochmann, in Ind. Antig. i. 164.

† Some notice of Major Yule, whose valuable Oriental MSS. were presented to the British Museum after his death, will be found in Dr. Rieu's Preface to the Catalogue of Persian MSS. (vol. iii. p. xviii.)

c. 1760. “Tambakû. It is known from the Madîr-i-Rahîmî that the tobacco came from Europe to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akbar Shâh (1556-1605), since which time it has been in general use.”—Bahâr-i-’Ajam, quoted by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1878. It appears from Miss Bird’s Japan that tobacco was not cultivated in that country till 1605. In 1612 and 1615 the Shogun prohibited both culture and use of tabako.—See the work, i. 276-77.

Tobra, s. The leather nose-bag in which a horse’s feed is administered.

1808. “. . . stable boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra, or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostler loathe and leave it alone.”—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

Toddy, s. A corruption of Hind. târî, i.e. the fermented sap of the târ or palmyra (Sansk. tâl), and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryota urens; palm-wine. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced.

The tâl-tree seems to be indicated, though confusedly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. B.C. 320. “Megasthenes tells us . . . the Indians were in old times nomadic . . . were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (?) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tala, and that there grew on them as there grows at the tops of the (date) palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool.”—Arrian, Indica, vii., tr. by McCrindle.

circa 1330. “. . . There is another tree of a different species, which . . . gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tari.”—Friar Jordanus, 16.

1611. “Palmiti Wine, which they call Taddy.”—N. Downton, in Purchas, i. 298.

1615. “And then more to glad yee Weele have a health to al our friends in Tadee.”

Verses to T. Coryat, in Crudities, iii. 47.

1623. “. . . on board of which we stayed till nightfall, entertaining with conversation and drinking tari, a liquor which is drawn from the coco-nut trees, of a whitish colour, a little turbid, and of a somewhat rough taste, though with a blending of sweetness, and not unpalatable, something like one of our vinî picecanti. It will also intoxicate, like wine, if drunk over freely.”—P. della Valle, ii. 530.

1648. “The country . . . is planted with palmito-trees, from which a sap is drawn called Terry, that they very commonly drink.”—Van Twist, 12.

1653. “. . . le tari qui est le vin ordinaire des Indes.”—De la Boullage-le-Gouz, 246.

1673. “The Natives singing and roaring all Night long; being drunk with Toddy, the Wine of the Cooce.”—Fryer, 53.

“As for the rest, they are very respectful, unless the Seamen or Soldiers get drunk, either with Toddy or Bang.”—Ibid. 91.

See also Wheeler, ii. 125, by which it appears that this word was in common use in Madras in 1710.

1686. “Besides the Liquor or Water in the Fruit, there is also a sort of Wine drawn from the Tree called Toddy, which looks like Whey.”—Dampier, i. 293.

1705. “. . . cette liqueur s’appelle tarif.”—Luillier, 43.

1750. “J. Was vor Leute trincken Toddy? C. Die Soldaten, die Land Portugiesen, die Parreier und Schiffeleute trincken diesen Toddy.”—Madras, oder Fort St. George, &c., Halle, 1750.

1857. “It is the unfermented juice of the Palmyra which is used as food: when allowed to ferment, which it will do before midday, if left to itself, it is changed into a sweet, intoxicating drink called ‘kal’ or ‘toddy.’”—Bp. Caldwell, Lectures on Tinnevely Mission, p. 33.

“The Rat, returning home full of Toddy, said, If I meet the Cat, I will tear him in pieces.”—Ceylon Proverb, in Ind. Antiq. i. 59.

Of the Scotch application of the word we can find but one example in Burns, and, strange to say, no mention in Jameson's Dictionary:

1785.

"The lads an' lasses, blythely bent
To mind baith saul an' body,
Sit round the table, weel content
An' steer about the toddy. . . ."
Burns, The Holy Fair.

1798. "Action of the case, for giving her a dose in some toddy, to intoxicate and inflame her passions."—Roots's Reports, i. 80.

1804.

" . . . I've nae fear for 't;
For siller, faith, ye ne'er did care for 't,
Unless to help a needful body,
An' get an antrin glass o' toddy."
Tannahill, Epistle to James Barr.

Toddy-bird, s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya, or Weaver-bird (Ploceus Baya, Blyth); but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder.

c. 1750-60. "It is in this tree (palmyra or brab, q.v.) that the toddy-birds, so called from their attachment to that tree, make their exquisitely curious nests, wrought out of the thinnest reeds and filaments of branches, with an imitable mechanism, and are about the bigness of a partridge (?) The birds themselves are of no value . . ."
—Grose, i. 48.

Toddy-Cat, s. This name is in S. India applied to the Paradoxurus Musanga, Jerdon. It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see chutt). Its name is given from its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

Tola, s. An Indian weight (chiefly of gold or silver), not of extreme antiquity. Hind. tola (Sansk. talā, a balance, tul to lift up, to weigh). The Hindu scale is 8 rattis (q.v.) = 1 māsha, 12 māshas = 1 tola. Thus the tola was equal to 96 rattis. The proper weight of the ratti, which was the old Indian unit of weight, has been determined by Mr. E. Thomas as 1.75 grains, and the medieval tanga which was the prototype of the rupee was of 100 rattis weight. "But . . . the factitious ratti of the Muslims was merely an aliquot part— $\frac{1}{80}$  of the comparatively recent tola, and  $\frac{1}{8}$  of the newly devised rupee."

By the Regulation VII. of 1833, putting the British India coinage on its present footing (see under Seer) the tola weighing 180 grs., which is also the weight of the rupee, is established by the same regulation, as the unit of the system of weights, 80 tolas = 1 ser, 40 *ser*s = 1 maund.

1563. "I knew a secretary of Nizamoxa, a native of Coraçon, who ate every day three tolas (of opium), which is the weight of ten cruzados and a half; but this Coraçon (Khorasāni), though he was a man of letters and a great scribe and official, was always nodding or sleeping."—Garcia, f. 155b.

1610. "A Tole is a rupee challany of silver, and ten of these Toles are the value of one of gold."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 217.

1615-16. "Two tole and a half being an ounce."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 54b.

Tomaun, s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 7s. 6d. Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dīnārs; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degenerating in value. The tomaun in Fryer's time (1677) is reckoned by him as equal to £3. 6s. 8d. P. della Valle's estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4. 10s. 0d., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert's valuation (5 × 13s. 8d.) is the same as Fryer's.

In the first two of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

c. 1347. "I was informed . . . that when the Kān assembled his troops, and called the array of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amir Tumān, or lord of 10,000."—In Batuta, iv. 299-300.

A form of the Tartar word seems to have passed into Russian:

c. 1559. "One thousand in the language of the people is called Tissutze: likewise ten thousand in a single word Tma: twenty thousand, Duuetma: thirty thousand, Titma."—Herberstein, Della Moscovia, Ramusio, iii. 159.

1619. "L'ambasciadore Indiano . . .

ordinò che donasse a tutti un tomano, cioè dieci zecchini per uno."—P. della Valle, ii. 22.

c. 1630. "But how miserable so ere it seemes to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; filling every yeere his insatiate coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five markes sterlin)." —Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

1677. "... Receipt of Custom (at Gombroon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thomands, every Thomand making Three pound and a Noble in our Accompt, Half which we have a Right to."—Fryer, 222.

1711. "Camels, Houses, &c., are generally sold by the Tomand, which is 200 Shahes or 50 Abassees; and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Tomands, as we reckon by Pounds in England."—Lockyer, 229.

Tomback, s. An alloy of copper and zinc, i.e., a particular modification of brass, formerly imported from Indo-Chinese countries. Port. tambaca, from Malay tāmbaga and tāmbaga, 'copper,' which is again from Sansk. tamṛika and tāmra.

1602. "Their drummes are huge pannes made of a metall called Tomabaga, which makes a most hellish sound."—Scott, Discourse of Iaua, in Purchas, i. 180.

1690. "This Tombac is a kind of Metal, whose scarcity renders it more valuable than Gold. ... 'Tis thought to be a kind of natural Compound of Gold, Silver, and Brass, and in some places the mixture is very Rich, as at Borneo, and the Moneilloes, in others more allayed, as at Siam."—Ovington, 510.

1759. "The Productions of this Country (Siam) are prodigious quantities of Grain, Cotton, Benjamin . . . and Tambanek." —In Dalrymple, i. 119.

Tom-tom, s. Tamṭam, a native drum. The word comes from India, and is chiefly used there. Forbes (Ras-Mala, ii. 401) says the thing is so called because used by criers who beat it tām-tām, 'place by place,' i.e. first at one place, then at another. But it is rather an onomatopoeia, not belonging to any language in particular. In Ceylon it takes the form tamattama, in Malay it is ton-ton, all with the same meaning.

In French the word tamtam is used, not for a drum of any kind, but for a Chinese gong (q.v.) M. Littré however, in the Supplement to his Dict., remarks that this use is erroneous.

1693. "It is ordered that to-morrow morning the Choultry Justices do cause the Tom Tom to be beat through all the Streets of the Black Town . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 268.

1711. "Their small Pipes, and Tom Toms, instead of Harmony made the Discord the greater."—Loakyer, 235.

1755. In the Calcutta Mayor's expenses we find:

"Tom Tom, R. 1 1 0."—In Long, 56.

1764. "You will give strict orders to the Zemindars to furnish Oil and Musshauls, and Tom Toms and Pikemen, &c., according to custom."—Ibid., 391.

1770. "... An instrument of brass which the Europeans lately borrowed from the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tam" (!).—Abbé Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 30.

1789. "An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng . . ."—Munro, Narrative, 73.

1804. "I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the bazar by beat of tom-tom."—Wellington, iii. 186.

1824. "The Mahrattas in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tamtams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible."—Seely, ch. iv.

1836. "'Did you ever hear a tom-tom, Sir?' sternly replied the Captain . . .

'A what?' asked Hardy, rather taken aback.

'A tom-tom.'

'Never!'

'Nor a gum-gum?'

'Never!'

'What is a gum-gum?' eagerly inquired several young ladies."—Sketches by Boz, The Steam Excursion.

1862. "The first musical instruments were without doubt percussive sticks, calabashes, tomtoms."—Herbert Spencer, First Principles, 356.

1881. "The tom-tom is ubiquitous. It knows no rest. It is content with depriving man of his, It selects by preference the hours of the night as the time for its malign influence to assert its most potent sway. It reverberates its dull unmeaning monotones through the fitful dreams which sheer exhaustion brings. It inspires delusive hopes by a brief lull only to break forth with refreshed vigour into wilder ecstasies of maniacal fury—accompanied with nasal incantations and protracted howls . . ."—Overland Times of India, April 14th.

Tonga, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. tāngā. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla and Darjeeling.

1874. "The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poona or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances . . . . The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion."—Settlement Report of Násik.

1879. "A tongha dāk has at last been started between Rajpore and Dehra. The first tongha took only 5½ hours from Rajpore to Saharunpore."—Pioneer Mail.

1880. "In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that 'Syud Mahomed Padshah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain moolahs of tonga dāk' . . . . Is the relentless tonga a region of country or a religious organization? . . . . The original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after 'certain moolahs.' Then came an independent sentence about the tonga dāk working admirably between Peshawur and Jellalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times, interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen, associating the ominous mystery with the moolahs, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own."—Pioneer Mail, June 10th.

1881. "Bearing in mind Mr. Framji's extraordinary services, notably those rendered during the mutiny, and . . . that he is crippled for life . . . by wounds received while gallantly defending the mail tonga cart in which he was travelling, when attacked by dacoits . . ."—Letter from Bombay Govt. to Govt. of India, 17th June, 1881.

Tonicatchy, Tunnyketch, s. In Madras this is the name of the domestic water-carrier, who is generally a woman, and acts as a kind of under housemaid. It is a corr. of Tamil tannir-kāssi, an abbreviation of tannir-kāsatti, 'water-woman.'

c. 1780. "Voudriez-vous me permettre de faire ce trajet avec mes gens et mes bagages, qui ne consistent qu'en deux malles, quatre caisses de vin, deux ballots de toiles, et deux femmes, dont l'une est ma cuisinière, et l'autre, ma tannie karetje ou porteuse d'eau."—Haafner, i. 242.

1792. "The Armenian . . . now mounts a bit of blood . . . and . . . dashes the mud about through the streets of the Black Town, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tawny-kertches."—Madras Courier, 26th April.

Tonjon, and vulg. Tomjohn, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palankin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jampan (q.v.) for use in a hilly country has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung.

We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given by Williamson below, unless it is intended for 'thām-jāngh,' which might mean 'support-thigh.' The word is perhaps one adopted from some transgangetic language.

Mr. Platts in his new Hindustani Dict. (1884) gives as forms in that language tāmghām and tāmjan.

A rude conveyance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a 'Tellicherry chair' (ii. 40).

c. 1804. "I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog., 283.

1810. "About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jaung, i.e. 'a support to the feet.'"—Williamson, V. M., i. 322-3.

"Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palankeen, to meet me."—Maria Graham, 166.

1829. "I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson's tonjon, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 88.

1839. "He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlebow, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!"—Letters from Madras, 290.

Toolsy, s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocimum sanctum, L.), Sansk. tulsi or tulasī, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of masonry in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastic quoted below. See also Ward's Hindus, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

1672. "Almost all the Hindus . . . adore a plant like our Basilico gentile, but of more pungent odour . . . Every one before his house has a little altar, girt with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers, and in these the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas."—P. Vincenzo Maria, 800.

1673. "They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little place or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Calamint, or (by them called) Tulce, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence."—Fryer, 199.

1842. "Veneram a planta chamada Tulosse, por dizerem é do patee dos Deoses, e por isso é commun no patee de suas casas, e todas as manhas lhe vão tributar veneração."—Annaes Maritimos, iii. 453.

1872. "At the head of the ghât, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant . . . placed on a high pedestal of masonry."—Govinda Samanta, i. 18.

Toomongong. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johôr, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johôr are the representatives of the old Mahomedan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johôr, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tumangung was a minister who had in Peshwa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure: and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawford says: 'The word is most probably Javanese, and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office' (Malay Dict. s.v.)

1884. "Singapore had originally been purchased from two Malay chiefs; the Sultan and Tumangong of Johore. The former, when Sir Stamford Raffles entered into the arrangement with them, was the titular sovereign, whilst the latter, who held an hereditary office, was the real ruler."—Cavenagh, Reminis. of an Indian Official, 273.

Toon, Toon-wood, s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Meliaceae, Hind. tun, and tûn, Skt. tumna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner's work in many parts of India. It is identified by Bentham with the Red Cedar of N. S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller).* A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch'un, which looks like the same word.

1810. "The toon, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal . . ."—Maria Graham, 101.

1837. "Rosellini informs us that there is an Egyptian harp at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Athenaeum, 22d July, 1837). This may be Cedrela Toona."—Royle's Hindu Medicine, 30.

Toorkey, s. A Turkî horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeders of Asia Minor.

1678. "Four horses bought for the Company—

	Pagodas.
One young Arab at . . .	160
One old Turkey at . . .	40
One Atchein at . . .	20
One of this country at . . .	20

Fort St. George Consultations, 6th March, in Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871.

1782. "Wanted one or two Tanyans (see Tangun) rising six years old, Wanted also a Bay Toorkey, or Bay Tazzi Horse for a Buggy . . ."—India Gazette, Feb. 9th.

"To be disposed of at Ghyretty . . . a Buggy, almost new . . . a pair of uncommonly beautiful spotted Toorkays."—Id. March 2.

Tootnague, s. Port. tutenaga. This word appears to have two different applications. a. a Chinese alloy of copper, zinc, and nickel, sometimes called 'white copper' (i.e. peh-tung of the Chinese). The finest qualities are alleged to contain arsenic.* The best comes from Yunnan, and Mr. Joubert of the Garnier Expedition, came to the conclusion that it was produced by a direct mixture of the ores in the furnace.† b. It is used in Indian trade in the same loose way that spelter is used, for either zinc or peuter (peh-yuen, or 'white lead' of the Chinese).

The base of the word is no doubt the Pers. tūtīa, an oxide of zinc, but the formation of the word is obscure. Possibly * St. Julien et P. Champion, Industries Anc. et Modernes de l'Emp. Chinois, 1868 i. 75. Welsch, Wissenschaften, 433 v. "The peh-tung argentum, or white copper of the Chinese, is an alloy of copper 40·4, zinc 25·4, nickel 31·6, and iron 2·6, and occasionally a little silver; these proportions are nearly those of German silver."—Middle Kingdom, ed. 1883, ii. 19.

the last syllable is merely an adjective affix, in which way nāk is used in Persian. Or it may be nāga in the sense of lead, which is one of the senses given by Shakespear. In one of the quotations below tutenague is confounded with calin (see Calay). Moodene Sheriff gives as synonyms for zinc, Tam. tuttanāgam, Tel. tuttu-nāgam, Mahr. and Guz. tutti-nāga.

Sir G. Staunton is curiously wrong in supposing (as his mode of writing seems to imply) that tutenague is a Chinese word.

1605. "4500 Pikals of Tintenaga (for Tiutenaga) or Spelter."—In Valentiñ, v. 329.

1644. "That which they export (from Cochin to Orissa) is pepper, although it is prohibited, and all the drugs of the south, with Callaym, Tutunaga, wares of China and Portugal; jewelled ornaments; but much less nowadays, for the reasons already stated . . ."—Bocarro, MS., f. 316.

1675. " . . . from thence with Dollars to China for Sugar, Tea, Porcelane, Lac-cared Ware, Quicksilver, Tuthinag, and Copper . . ."—Fryer, 86.

1679. Letter from Dacca reporting . . . "that Dacca is not a good market for Gold, Copper, Lead, Tin, or Tutenague."—Fort St. George Consultations, Oct. 31, in Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871.

1780. "At Quedah, there is a trade for calin or tutenague . . . to export to different parts of the Indies."—Dunn, New Directory, 5th ed. 338.

1797. "Tu-te-nag is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamine; the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Staunton's Acct. of Lord Macartney's Embassy (4to ed.) ii. 540.

Topaz, Topass, &c. s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of the Pers. (from Turkish) top-chī, a gunner. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topī, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by the natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topī-wālās (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class called themselves gente de chapeo (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misrendering of topaz from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, propounds in another passage that topaz is a corruption of do-bhāshiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of dubash, q.v.), viz., using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 50 and 144).

The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1602. "The 12th ditto we saw to seaward another Champaigne (Sampan) wherein were 20 men, Mestiços and Toupas."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 34 (pub. 1648).

1673. "To the Fort then belonged 300 English, and 400 Topazes, or Portugal Firemen."—Fryer, 66.

In his glossarial Index Fryer gives "Topazes, Musketeers."

1680. "It is resolved and ordered to entertain about 100 Topasses, or Black Portuguese, into pay."—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686. "It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependance on them."—In do., 159.

1690. "A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one Abdal Ghaford, was taken by Hat-men, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans."—Ovington, 411.

1705. " . . . Topases, qui sont des gens du pais qu'on élève et qu'on habille à la Française, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholique par quelques uns de nos Missionnaires."—Luillier, p. 45-46.

1711. "The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanhams, or 1*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Mungrel Portuguese, at 50, or 52 Fanhams per Month."—Lockyer, 14.

1727. "Some Portuguese are called Top- passes . . . will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany.”—A. Ham.

1745. “Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mestices et Topases, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères.”—Norbert, n. 31.

1747. “The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coffrees, and Seapoys, altogether about Two Thousand (2000).”—MS. Consultations at Ft. St. David, 1st March. (In India Office.)

1749. “600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crowd of useless Topasses and Poons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed.”—In A Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Company, p. 57.

“The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madrass knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the antient Portuguese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vitious withal, and for the most Part as weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites for a Soldier.”—Id. App., p. 103.

1756. “. . . in this plight, from half an hour after eleven till near two in the morning, I sustained the weight of a heavy man, with his knees on my back, and the pressure of his whole body on my head; a Dutch sergeant, who had taken his seat upon my left shoulder, and a Topaz bearing on my right.”—Holwell's Narr. of the Black Hole.

1758. “There is a distinction said to be made by you . . . which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab.”—Court's Letter, in Long, 133.

c. 1785. “Topasses, black foot soldiers, descended from Portuguese marrying natives, called topasses because they wear hats.”—Curracchio's Clive, iv. 564.

The same explanation is in Orme, i. 80.

1787. “. . . Assuredly the mixture of Moormen, Rajahpoots, Gentoos, and Malabars in the same corps is extremely beneficial * * I have also recommended the corps of Topasses or descendants of Europeans, who retain the characteristic qualities of their progenitors.”—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1789. “Topasses are the sons of Europeans and black women, or low Portuguese, who are trained to arms.”—Munro, Narrative, 321.

1817. “Topasses, or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portuguese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith.”—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

Tope, s. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. H. töp. A cannon. This is Turkish töp, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further back.

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tamil töppu, Telug. töpu, and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bāgh.

1673. “. . . flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoes, Guavas.”—Pryer, 40.

“The Country is Sandy; yet plentiful in Provisions; in all places, Tops of Trees.”—Ibid. 41.

1747. “The Topes and Walks of Trees in and about the Bounds will furnish them with firewood to burn, and Clay for Bricks is almost everywhere.”—Report of a Council of War at Fort St. David, in Consen. of May 5th, MS. in India Office.

1754. “A multitude of People set to the work finished in a few days an entrenchment, with a stout mud wall, at a place called Facquire's Tope, or the grove of the Facquire.”—Orme, i. 273.

1799. “Upon looking at the Tope as I came in just now, it appeared to me, that when you get possession of the bank of the Nullah, you have the Tope as a matter of course.”—Wellington Despatches, i. 23.

1809. “. . . behind that a rich country, covered with rice fields and topes.”—Id. Valentia, i. 557.

1814. “It is a general practice when a plantation of mango trees is made, to dig a well on one side of it. The well and the tope are married, a ceremony at which all the village attends, and large sums are often expended.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 56.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word töp is in local use in the N. W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from the Sansk. stūpa through the Pali or Prakrit thūpo.* The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikyala in the Rawul Pindi district.

Tope-khana, s. The Artillery, Artillery Park, or Ordnance Department, Turco - Pers. tōp-khāna "cannon-house" or "cannon-department." The word is the same that appears so often in reports from Constantinople as the Tophaneh. Unless the traditions of Donna Tofana are historical, we are strongly disposed to suspect that Aqua Tofana may have had its name from this word.

"Khan Dowran and the rest of the Omrahs, with their forces, and all the King's Tope conna, kept guard round the Fort."—(Reference lost.) 1765. "He and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (i.e., Darogha), the cannon were loaded with powder only."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 96.

Topee, s. A hat, Hind. topī. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, 'a top-knot, and topete, a 'toupee'), which is probably Teutonic, identical with English and Dutch 'top,' L. German topp, French toupet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind. word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived.

With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

1498. In the vocabulary ("Este he a linguagem de Calicut") we have: "barrete (i.e. a cap): tupy."—Roteiro, 118.

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed:

"Trazem em a moleera huuns topetes por signall que sam Christãos."—Ib. 52.

1849. "Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi, to keep off his importunacy."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1883. "Tope, a solar helmet."—Wills, Modern Persia, 263.

Topeewala, s. Hind. topīwālā; 'one who wears a hat,' generally a European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1808) Topeewala and Puggrywala were used in Guzerat and the Mahratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.'

The author of the Persian Life of Hydur Naik (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls Europeans Kalāh-posh, i.e. 'hat-wearers' (p. 85).

1803. "The descendants of the Portuguese . . . unfortunately their ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3d ed. iii. 5.

1874. ". . . you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All topiwālās . . . are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren."—Govinda Samānta, ii. 211.

Torcull, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malayalam tiru-koyil, 'temple.' See i. 253, 254; also the Eng. Trans. of 1582, f. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed. of the 1st book of Castanheda, turcoll occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions.

Toshaconna, s. P. H. toshakūāna. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man's establishment. The tosha-khāna is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

1799. "After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swamies (q.v.), which were in the toshekanah, were given to the brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Macleod and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them."—Wellington, i. 56.

Tostdaun, s. Military Hind. tosdān for a cartouche-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshadān, 'provision-holder,' a wallet.

Toty, s. Tamil-Canarese, tōṭi; in S. India a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, etc., for the community.

1730. "Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appelé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques."—Lettres Édif., xiii. 371.

Toucan, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Buceros, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying 'a worker,' from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Rhamphastes or Zygodactyle. Tukang is really in Malay a 'craftsman or artificer'; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird.

We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay 'an artificer,' but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan 'carpintero' from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no room for doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thevet's, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Oviedo (c.1535), but he mentions only the name by which "the Christians" called it,—in Ramusio's Italian Picuto (? Beccuto;—Sommario, in Ramusio, iii. f. 60).

1558. "Sur la coste de la marine, la plus frequente marchandise est le plumage d'un oiseau, qu'ils appellent en leur langue Toucan, lequel descrivons sommairement puis qu'il vient à propos. Cest oiseau est de la grandeur d'un pigeon. . . . Au reste cest oiseau est merveilleusement difforme et monstrueux, ayant le bec plus gros et plus long quasi que le reste du corps."—Les Singularitez de la France Antarctique, autrement nommée Amerique . . . Par T. André Thevet, Natif d'Angoulesme. Paris, 1558, f. 91.

1648. "Tucana sive Toucan Brasilien-sibus: avis picae aut palumbi magnitudine. . . . Rostrum habet ingens et nonnumquam palmum longum, exterius flavam. . . . Mirum est autem videri possit quomodo tantilla avis tam grande rostrum ferat; sed levissimum est."—Georgi Marcgravi de Liebstad, Hist. Rerum Natur. Brasiliae. Lib. V. cap. xv., in Hist. Natur. Brasil. Lugd. Bat. 1648, p. 217.

See also (1599) Aldrovandus, Ornitholog., lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucham.

Traga, s. The extreme form of dhurna (q.v.) among the Rajputs and connected tribes, in which the complainant puts himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode of bringing vengeance on the oppressor.

The tone adopted by some persons and papers at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of traga intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him.

1803. A case of traga is recorded in Sir Jasper Nicoll's Journal, at the capture of Gawilgarh by Sir A. Wellesley. See note to Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 387.

1813. "Every attempt to levy an assessment is succeeded by the Tarakaw, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 91.

1819. For an affecting story of Traga, see Macmurdo, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans., i. 281.

Tranquebar, n. p. A seaport of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1845. The true name is said to be Tarañgan-pāḍi, 'Sea-Town' or 'Wave-town.'

1610. "The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they do much service to God in their establishment at Negapatam, both among Portuguese and natives, and that there is a settlement of newly converted Christians who are looked after by the catechumens of the parish (freguezia) of Trangabar . . ."—King's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 285.

Travancore, n. p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the reigning dynasty of the kingdom which is known by the name has been called. The true name is said to be Tiru-vidān-koḍu, shortened to Tiruvānkoḍu.

1553. "And at the place called Travancor, where this Kingdom of Coulam terminates, there begins another Kingdom taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the Rey Grande, because he is greater in his dominion, and in the state which he keeps, than those other princes of Malabar; and he is subject to the King of Narsinga."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1609. "The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come."—King of Spain's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 257.

Tribeny, n. p. Skt. Tri-venī, 'three-fold braid'; a name which properly belongs to Prayāga (Allahābād), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Jumna, and (unseen) Sarasvati are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by bestowing the names of Jumna and Sarasvati on two streams connected with the Hugli. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the melas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

Trichies or Tritchies, s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Trichinopoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns. But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see under cheroot). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1876. "Between whiles we smoked, generally Manillas, now supplanted by foul Dindiguls and fetid Trichies."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 7.

Trichinopoly, n. p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India. The etymology and proper form has been the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiruta-palli, 'Little-Town.' But this may safely be rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1520) as Tiru-śśila-palli, apparently 'Holy-rock-town.' In the Tēvāram the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-sira-puram, 'Three-head-town,' with allusion to a 'three-headed' demon.

Trincomalee, n. p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukko-nātha-malai, or Taraṅga-malai. The last ('Sea-Hill') seems conceived to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-kona-malai, for 'Three-peak-Hill.' There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Trikonēśwara.

1602. "This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds unknowing whither he went. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Ceilon), where he made the land at a haven called Preaturé, between Triquillimale and the point of Jafanapattam."—Couto, V. i. 5.

1672. "Trinquenemale hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, yea one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Belligamme, Gale, or Colombo."—Baldaeus, 413.

1675. "The Cinghalese themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from another country ... that some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanassery ... came to land near the Hill of Tricoenmale with 1800 or 2000 men ... ."—Rycklof van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 210.

Tripang, s. The sea-slug (Holothurida). This is the Malay name. See Swallow, and Beche-de-mer.

Triplacane, n. p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the "Nabob of the Carnatic" is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-valli-kēdi, 'sacred-creeper-tank.' Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-alli-kēni, 'sacred-lily-(Nymphaca rubea) tank.'

In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871, No. I. p. 28.

1679. "The Didwan (? Diwan) from Conjeveram, who pretends to have come from Cort, having sent word from Treplicane that unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phyrmaund he would carry it back to Court again, answer is returned that it hath not been accustomed for the Governors to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund except there come therewith a Serpow (see Seerpaw) or a Tasheriff" (see Tashreef).—Do., do., 2nd Dec. in Notes and Extracts, 1873, No. III. p. 40.

Trivandrum, n. p. The modern capital of the state now known as Travancore (q.v.). Properly Tiru-(v)anantā-puram, 'Sacred Vishnu-Town.'

Trumpák, n. p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormuz on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is shown by Lt. Stiffe's account of that island (see Geogr. Magazine, i. 13) to have been Türün-bāgh, 'Garden of Türün,' and it was properly the palace of the old Kings, of whom more than one bore the name of (Türün or Türün Shāh).

1507. "When the people of the city saw that they were so surrounded, that from no direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a guard for the pools of Turunbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them . . . ."—Comment. of Albuquerque, E. T. by Birch, i. 175.

1610. "The island has no fresh water . . . only in Turunbaque, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Wazir take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything that is planted."—Teixeira, Rel. de los Reyes de Harmuz, 115.

Tucka, s. Hind. tākā, Beng. tākā. This is the word commonly used among Bengalis for 'a rupee.' But in other parts of India it (or at least tākā) is used differently; as for aggregates of 4, or of 2 pice, e.g. (pāñch tākā paisa, five tākā of pice, generally in N. W. P. = 20 pice). It is most probably a form of tanga (q.v.) and of Skt. ṭanka, 'a stamped coin.'

1874. " . . . How much did my father pay for her?"

"He paid only ten tākās."
"I may state here that the word rupeyā, or as it is commonly written rupee or rupi, is unknown to the peasantry of Bengal, at least to Bengali Hindu peasants; the word they invariably use is tākā."—Govinda Samānta, i. 209.

Tuckávee, s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar. H. takāvi, from Ar. kavi, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

Tuckeed, s. An official reminder. Ar. Hind. takīd, emphasis, injunction, and verb takīd karnā, to enjoin stringently, to insist.

1862. "I can hardly describe to you my life—work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and session cases, and a continual irritation of tuckeeds and offensive remarks . . . these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery."—Letter from Col. J. R. Becher, in (unpublished) Memoir, p. 28.

Tulwaur, s. Hind. tulwār and tarwār, 'a sabre.' Williams gives Skt. taravāri and tarabālika.

1853. "The old native officer who carried the royal colour of the regiments was cut down by the blow of a Sikh tulwar."—Oakfield, ii. 78.

Tumasha, s. An entertainment, a spectacle (in the French sense), a popular excitement. It is Arab. tamāshi, 'going about to look at anything entertaining.' The word is in use in Turkestan (see Schuyler, below).

1610. "Heere are also the ruines of Ranichand (qu. Ramchand's?) Castle and Houses which the Indians acknowledge for the great God, saying that he took flesh vpon him to see the Tamasha of the World."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 436.

1876. "If you told them that you did not want to buy anything, but had merely come for tomasha, or amusement, they were always ready to explain and show you everything you wished to see."—Schuyler's Turkistan, i. 176.

Tumlet, s. Domestic Hind. tamlat, being a corruption of tumbler.

Tumlook, n. p. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hoogly near its mouth, formerly called Tamralipti or -lipta. It occurs in the Mahābhārat and many other Sanskrit works. "In the Dasa Kumāra and Vrihat Katha, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as the great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean." (Prof. H. H. Wilson, in J. R. As. Soc. v. 135).

1866. "We had only 3 coss to go, and we should have met a pair of tumtums which would have taken us on."—The Darw Bungalow, 384.

Tunca, Tuncaw, &c., s. Pers. Hind. tankhwāh, pron. tankhā. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern use it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant.

For a full account of special older uses of the word see Wilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1753. "Roydoolub . . . has taken the discharge of the tuncaws and the arrears of the Nabob's army upon himself."—Orme, iii.

1760. "You have been under the necessity of writing to Mr. Howell (who was sent to collect in the tuncars . . . The low men that are employed in the tuncars are not to be depended on."—The Nawab to the Pres. and Council of Ft. Wm., in Long, 233.

1778. "These rescripts are called tuncaws, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in."—Orme, ii. 276.

Tura, s. Or. Turk. tūra. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahomedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have missed the truth. The explanation of tūr which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show these tūra to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is 'a gabion.'

Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tūbra, and says, "Tūbras are nosebags, but . . . Badáúni makes the meaning plain, by saying they were filled with earth (Tárikh-i-Badáúni, f. 136) . . . The sacks used by Sher Sháh as temporary fortifications on his march towards Rájputána were túbras" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident however that Baber's túras were no tobras (q.v.), whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 405) regarding Sher Sháh shows that the use of bags filled with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The túbra of Badáúni may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gabions implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1526. (At the Battle of Pānīpat) "I directed that, according to the custom of Rām, the gun-carriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carriages were 6 or 7 túras (or breastworks). The matchlock men stood behind these guns and túras, and discharged their matchlocks. . . . It was settled, that as Pānīpat was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses, while we might fortify our front by túras . . . ."—Baber, p. 304.

1528. (At the siege of Chānderī) "over-seers and pioneers were appointed to construct works on which the guns were to be planted. All the men of the army were directed to prepare túras and scaling-ladders, and to serve the túras which are used in attacking forts. . . ."—Ibid., p. 376.

The editor's note at the former passage is: "The meaning (viz. 'breastwork') assigned to Túra here, and in several other places, is merely conjectural, founded on Petis de la Croix's explanation, and on the meaning given by Meninski to Túr, viz. reticulatus. The Túras may have been formed by the branches of trees, interwoven like basket-work . . . or they may have been covered defences from arrows and missiles . . . ." Again: "These Túras, so often mentioned, appear to have been a sort of testudo, under cover of which the assailants advanced, and sometimes breached the wall. . . ."

Turaka, n. p. This word is applied both in Mahrattī and in Telugu to the Mahommedans (Turks). Like this is Tarūk which the Burmese now apply to the Chinese. See Tarouk.

Turban, s. Some have supposed this well-known English word to be a corruption of the Pers. Hind. sirband * ('head-wrap'). This is however quite inconsistent with the history of the word. Wedgwood's suggestion that the word may be derived from Fr. turbin, 'a whelk,' is equally to be rejected. It is really a corruption of one which, though it seems to be out of use in modern Turkish, was evidently used by the Turks when Europe first became familiar with the Ottomans and their ways. This is set forth in the quotation below from Zedler's Lexicon, which is corroborated by those from Rycout and from Galland, &c. The proper word was apparently dulband. Some modern Persian dictionaries give the only meaning of this as 'a sash.' But Meninsky explains it as 'a cloth of fine white muslin; a wrapper for the head'; and Vullers also gives it this meaning, as well as that of a 'sash or belt.'* In doing so he quotes Shakespear's dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could scarcely have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab. dul, 'volvere,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipant, Tolliban, Turbant, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban.†

Turkey, s. This fowl is called in Hindustani perā, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chili did. In Tamil the bird is called vān-kōri, 'great fowl.' Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey would appear to have been originally applied to another of the Pavonidae, the guinea-fowl, Meleagris of the ancients. Minsheu's explanations (quoted below), show strange confusions between the two birds. The French Cog d'Inde or Dindon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calcutische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicut) are specific in error as indicating the origin of the turkey in the East. This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicut, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowls of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Batuta makes quaint mention.* Zedler's great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1745, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calecutische and Indische because they were first brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast. Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And native scholars, instead of admitting the anachronism, have boldly maintained that the turkey had always been found in India (Dravidian Grammar, 2nd ed. p. 137). Padre Paolino was apparently of the same opinion, for whilst explaining that the etymology of Calicut is "Castle of the Fowls," he asserts that Turkeys (Galli d'India) came originally from India; being herein, as he often is, positive and wrong. In 1615 we find W. Edwards, the E. I. Company's agent at Ajmir, writing to send the Mogul "three or four Turkey cocks and hens, for he hath three cocks but no hens" (Colonial Paper, E. i. c. 388). Here however the ambiguity between the real turkey and the guinea-fowl may possibly arise.

In Egypt the bird is called Dik-Rāmī, 'fowl of Rām' (i.e. of Turkey), probably a rendering of the English term.

We do not know whether the mistake of Calcutta for Calicut belongs to the original author or to the translator—probably to the proverbial traditore.

Turnee, or Tunnee, s. An English supercargo. Sea-Hind. And probably a corruption of attorney. (Roebuck.)

Turpaul, s. Sea-Hind. A tarpaulin. (Ibid.)

Tussah, Tusser, s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly imported into England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in r as a vulgarity, like the use of solar for solah (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though written in Milburn (1813) tusha, and tusseh (ii. 158, 244), we find it in the Am-i-Akbari as tassar, and in Dr. Buchanan as tasar.

The term is supposed to be adopted from Sansk. tasara, trasara, Hind. tasar, 'a shuttle'; perhaps from the form of the cocoon? The moth whose worm produced this silk is generally identified with Antheraea paphia, but Capt. Hutton has shown that there are several species known as tasar worms. These are found almost throughout the whole extent of the forest tracts of India. But the chief seat of the manufacture of stuffs, wholly or partly of tasar silk, has long been Bhāgalpur on the Ganges.

The first mention of tasar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangpūr, as cited below in the Linnæan Transactions of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh (see Official Report on Sericulture in India, by J. Geoghegan, Calcutta, 1872).

I have heard that there is another variation of the Tusseh silkworm in the hills near Bauglipoor."—Letter of M. Atkinson, as above, in Linn. Trans., 1804, p. 41.

1802. "They (the insects) are found in such abundance over many parts of Bengal and the adjoining provinces as to have afforded to the natives, from time immemorial, an abundant supply of a most durable, coarse, dark-coloured silk, commonly called Tusseh silk, which is woven into a cloth called Tusseh doot'ries, much worn by Bramins and other sects of Hindoos."—Roxburgh, Ibid., 34.

c. 1809. "The chief use to which the tree (Terminalia elata, or Asan) is however applied, is to rear the Tasar silk."—F. Buchanan's Bhagulpoor (in Montgomery Martin, ii. 157 seq.).

Tuticorin, n. p. A sea-port of Tinnevely, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tamil Tüttukkudi. According to Fra Paolino the name is Tutukodi, 'a place where nets are washed,' but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from туру, 'a bush.' But see Bp. Caldwell below.

1544. "At this time the King of Cape Comorin, who calls himself the Great King" (see under Travancore), "went to war with a neighbour of his who was king of the places beyond the Cape, called Manapá and Totucury, inhabited by the Christians that were made there by Miguel Vaz, Vicar General of India at the time."—Correa, iv. 403.

1727. "Tutecareen has a good safe harbour . . . This colony superintends a Pearl-Fishery . . . which brings the Dutch Company 20,000*L.* yearly Tribute."—A. Ham., i. 334.

1881. "The final n in Tuticorin was added for some such euphonic reason as turned Kochchi into Cochín and Kumari into Comorin. The meaning of the name Tüttukkudi is said to be 'the town where the wells get filled up'; from tüttu (properly türttu), 'to fill up a well,' and kudi, 'a place of habitation, a town.' This derivation, whether the true one or not, has at least the merit of being appropriate . . ."—Bp. Caldwell, Hist. of Tinnevely, 75.

Tyconna, Tyekana, s. A room in the basement or cellarage, or dug in the ground, in which it has in some parts of India been an occasional practice to pass the hottest part of the day during the hottest season of the year. Pers. tah-khāna, 'nether-house,' i.e. 'subterranean apartment.'

1663. " . . . in these hot Countries, to entitle an House to the name of Good and Fair it is required it should be . . . furnish'd also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffing . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 79.

1842. "The heat at Jellalabad from the end of April was tremendous, 105° to 110° in the shade. Everybody who could do so lived in underground chambers called tykhānās. Broadfoot dates a letter 'from my den six feet under ground.'"—Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life (by Mrs. Mackenzie), i. 298.

Tuxall, Taksaul, s. The Mint. Hind. taksāl, from Sansk. ṭvaṅkaśālā, 'coin-hall.'

Typhoon, s. A tornado or cyclone-wind; a sudden-storm, a 'norwester' (q.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog. 57) ridicules "learned antiquarians" for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables, ta-fung = 'Great Wind.' His ridicule is misplaced. With a monosyllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English "tough 'un." Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow's) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a 'great wind.' The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language. E.g. Mandarin, pagoda, chop, cool'y, tutenague;—none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the tufão which our sailors made into touffon and then into typhoon, as they got the monção which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

The Arabic word is tūfān, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning 'an overpowering rain, . . . Noah's flood,' etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τυφών or τυφών. This word (the etymologists say, from τυφώ, 'I raise smoke') was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called 'a devil') to a 'waterspout,' and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. 'Waterspout' seems evidently the meaning of τυφών in the Meteorologica of Aristotle (γλυφεται μὲν οὖν τυφών. . . κ.τ.λ. iii. 1; the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly); and also in the quotation which we give from Aulus Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-tūfān) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii. 134, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, and in s. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Since the preceding paragraphs were written there has appeared a paper in the Journ. R. Geog. Soc. (vol. I. p. 260) by Dr. F. Hirth, in which the quasi-Chinese origin of the word is strongly advocated. Dr. Hirth has found the word T'ai (and also with the addition of fung, 'wind') to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formosa, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1694. Dr. Hirth thinks t'ai as here used (which is not the Chinese word ta or tai, 'great,' and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formosan term; and is of opinion that the combination t'ai-fung is "a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers first using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China sea." Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendez Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says tufão is the Chinese name for such storms.

Dr. Hirth's paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of the term typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tufão distinctly represents tūfān and not t'ai-fung, and the oldest English form 'tuffon' does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were applied first in the China sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon's use of the word typhones in his Latin below; also that tūfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to τυφών, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani (see the quotations 1810—1836 below). Little importance is to be attached to Pinto's linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropt by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming tope (in the sense of 'grove') to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhoon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of monsoon, simoom;* and it is quite possible that the Formosa mariners took up their (unexplained) t'ai-fung from the Dutch or Portuguese.

Platt's elaborate Hindustani Dict. 1884, is of course no authority for Arabic; but the successive meanings which he gives for ṭifān are: "a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon: a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge," &c. Also ṭufāni, "stormy, tempestuous . . . boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous."

Gellius*, xix. 2.

"Now having . . . continued our Navigation within this Bay of Cavuchin-china . . . upon the day of the nativity of our Lady, being the eight of September, for the fear that we were in of the new Moon, during the which there oftentimes happens in this Climate such a terrible storm of wind and rain, as it is not possible for ships to withstand it, which by the Chineses is named Tufan" (o qual tormento os Chins chamão tufão).—Pinto (orig. cap. l.) in Cogan, p. 60.

"... in the height of forty and one degrees, there arose so terrible a South-wind, called by the Chineses Tufaon (un tempo do Sul, a q̃ os Chins chamão tufão)"—Id. (cap. lxxix.) in Cogan, p. 97.

* Our friend Prof. Robertson Smith has appended to this article the following remarks in dissent from the view we have taken. We print them as a note, without attempting to recast our own article.

"The question of the origin of ṭifān appears to be somewhat tangled.

"Ṭufṭṭṭ, 'whirlwind, waterspout,' connected with ṭufṭṭ seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Sephōn, the northern one, in Joel ii. 20, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon.

"On the other hand ṭifān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Ṭifān, for Noah's flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true Semitic root ṭaf, 'to overflow.'

"But again, the sense of whirlwind is not recognized in classical Arabic. Even Dozy in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Bocher's) for the sense Tourbillon, trombe. Bistāni in the Mohit el Mohit does not give this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root ṭaf means 'to go round,' and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of ṭufṭṭ, typho, or tyfone. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of ṭifān."—W. R. S.

1602. "This Junk seeking to make the port of Chincheo met with a tremendous storm such as the natives call Tufão, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the spirits of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seems to raise a scud of flame, whilst in the space of one turning of the sand-glass the wind shall veer round to every point of the compass, seeming to blow more furiously from each in succession.

"Such is this phenomenon that the very birds of heaven, by some natural instinct, know its coming 8 days beforehand, and are seen to take their nests down from the tree-tops and hide them in crevices of rock. Eight days before, the clouds also are seen to float so low as almost to graze men's heads, whilst in these days the seas seem beaten down as it were, and of a deep blue colour. And before the storm breaks forth, the sky exhibits a token well-known to all, a great object which seamen call the Ox-Eye (Otho de Boi) all of different colours, but so gloomy and appalling that it strikes fear in all who see it. And as the Bow of Heaven, when it appears, is the token of fair weather and calm, so this seems to portend the Wrath of God, as we may well call such a storm. . . ." etc.—Couto, V. viii. 12.

U.

Ujungtanah, n. p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to 'Land's End,' from Ujung, 'point or promontory,' and 'tanah, 'land') of the extreme end of the Malay peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. Romania. In Godinho de Eredia's Declaracam de Malaca the term is applied to the whole peninsula, but owing to the interchangeable use of u, v, and of j, i, it appears there throughout as Viontana. The name is often applied by the Portuguese writers to the Kingdom of Johor, in which the Malay dynasty of Malacca established itself when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511; and it is even applied (as in the quotation from Barros) to their capital.

1553. "And that you may understand the position of the city of Ujantana, which Don Stephen went to attack, you must know that Ujantana is the most southerly and the most easterly point of the mainland of the Malacca coast, which from this Point (distant from the equator about a degree, and from Malacca something more than 40 leagues) turns north in the direction of the Kingdom of Siam . . . . On the western side of this point a river runs into the sea, so deep that ships can run up it 4 leagues beyond the bar, and along its banks, well inland, King Alaudin had established a big town . . ."—Barros, IV. xi. 13.

Umbrella, s. This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe. We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander; it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, on Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice and at Rome, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashantee. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignolli (c. 1350), Ruy Clavijo (c. 1404), Barbosa (1516), John de Barros (1553), and Minsheu (1617). See also Chatta, and Sombrero (the latter likewise in Suppt.).

Upas, s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word Upas is Javanese for poison, and became familiar in Europe in connexion with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which these stories were attached is one which has in the present century been described under the name of Antiaris toxicaria, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz., Antjar, or Anchar (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.

It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see Sumpitan).

The story of some deadly vegetable poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavernier, Oleyer, and Kaempfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connexion with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from which a quotation is given below, with others.

There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whence-soever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March, 1666, the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Amboyna where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ipo, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbor toxicaria.* Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray's Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The professed author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.† This person describes the tree, called Bohon-Upas, as situated "about 27 leagues* from Batavia, 14 from Soura Karta, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe" (probably for Tjukjoe, i.e. Djokjo-Karta) "the present residence of the Sultan of Java." Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Sura Karta in February, 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may however have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his Poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch's story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there really was a person of that name in the medical service in Java at the time indicated. In our article Anaconda, (pp. 16-17) we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary éclat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquebert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D'Entrecasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. i., which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct so far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch's romance, and it was at Surakarta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

* It must be kept in mind that though Rumphius (George Everard Rumpf) died in 1698, his great work was not printed till nearly fifty years afterwards (1741).

† Foersch was a surgeon of the third class at Samarang in the year 1773.—Horsfield, in Bat. Trans. as quoted below.

The tree from which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 feet at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds however that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz., Antiaris toxicaria (N. O. Artocarpæe).*

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antiaris, viz., the tiente,

M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own. He saw the Antiaris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwangi. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japara, and one near Onarang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as anchar.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield's Plantae Javanicae Rariores, 1838-52, pp. 52 segg., together with a figure of a flowering branch, pl. xiii.; and in Blume's Rumphia (Brussels, 1836), pp. 46 segg., and Pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance.

Blume gives a drawing, for the truth of which he vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as "vastas, arduas, et a ceteris segregatas,"—solitary and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe?), but not from any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out 'wings' or buttresses,* like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connexion with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of called sometimes Upas Raja, the plant producing which is a Strychnos, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upas is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upas of English metaphor, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Ipo (a form of Upas) of Macassar is the Antiaris; the ipo of the Borneo Dayaks is the Tiente.

exhalations of carbonic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, alluding particularly to a paper by M. Loudoun, (a Dutch official of Scotch descent) in the Edinburgh New Phil. Journal for 1832, p. 102, containing a formidable description of the Guwo Upas or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces. We may observe however that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudoun in this matter have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of "Java." And if the Foersch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Ray), Valentijn, Spielman, Kaempfer, and Rumphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putida commentatio, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerschian Upas-myth a kind of melodrama, called the Law of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11th, 1822. We give some quotations below.*

c. 1330. "En queste isole sono molte cose maravigliose e strane. Onde alcuni arbori li sono . . . che fanno veleno pessimo . . . Quelli uomini sono quasi tutti corsali, e quando vanno a battaglia portano ciascuno una canna in mano, di lunghezza d'un braccio e pongono in capo de la canna uno ago di ferro atossiato in quel veleno, e sofiano nella canna e l'ago vola e percuotelo dove vogliono, e'ncontinente quelli ch'è percosso muore. Ma egli hanno le tina piene di sterco d'uomo e una iscodella di sterco guarisce l'uomo da queste cotali ponture."—Storia di Frate Odorigo, from Palatina MS., in Cathay, &c., App., p. xlix.

c. 1630. "And (in Makasser) which is no lesse infernall, the men use long canes or trunks (cald Semptians), out of which they can (and use it) blow a little pricking quill, which if it draw the lest drop of blood from any part of the body, it makes him (though the strongest man living) die immediately; some venoms operate in an houre, others in a moment, the veynes and body (by the virulence of the poysen) corrupting and rotting presently, to any man's terrour and amazement, and feare to live where such abominations predominate."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 329.

* I remember when a boy reading the whole of Foersch's story in a fascinating book, called Wood's Zoography, which I have not seen for half a century, and which, I should suppose from my recollection, was more sensational than scientific.—Y.

1631. "I will now conclude; but first I must say something of the poison used by the King of Macassar in the Island of Celebes to envenom those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it can be plucked from the bones like so much mucus. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which, is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilent influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftness and other effects snatches the man from among the living.

"These are no idle tales, but the experience of eye-witnesses, not only among our countrymen, but among Danes and Englishmen."—Jac. Bontii, lib. v., cap. xxxiii.

1646. "Es wachst ein Baum auf Macassar, einer Cust auf der Insul Celebes, der ist trefflich vergiftet, dass wann einer nur an einem Glied damit verletzet wird, und man solches nit alsbald wegschlägt, der Gift geschwind zum Herten eilet, und den Garaus machet" (then the antidote as before is mentioned) . . . "Mit solchem Gift schmieren die Bandanesen Ihre lange Pfeil, die Sie von grossen Bögen, einer Mannsläng hoch, hurtig schiessen; in Banda aber tähten Ihre Weiber grossen Schaden damit. Denn Sie sich auf die Bäume setzten, und kleine Fischgeräth damit schmierten, und durch ein gehöhlet Röhrein, von einem Baum, auf unser Volck schossen, mit grossen machtigen Schaden."—Saar, Ost-Indranische Fünfzehn-Jahrige Kriegs-Dienste . . . 1672, pp. 46-47.

19. Whether it be true, that the only Antidote hitherto known, against the famous and fatal macassar-poison, is human ordure, taken inwardly? And what substance that poison is made of?—Philosophical Transactions, vol. ii., Anno 1667 (Proceedings for March 11th, 1666, i.e. N.S. 1667), p. 417.

1682. "The especial weapons of the Makassar soldiers, which they use against their enemies, are certain pointed arrowlets about a foot in length. At the foremost end these are fitted with a sharp and pointed fish-tooth, and at the butt with a knob of spongy wood.

"The points of these arrows, long before they are to be used, are dipt in poison and then dried.

"This poison is a sap that drips from the bark of the branches of a certain tree, like (resin, from pine-trees.

"The tree grows on the Island Makasser, in the interior, and on three or four islands of the Bugisess, round about Makassar. It is about the height of the clove-tree, and has leaves very similar.

"The fresh sap of this tree is a very deadly poison; indeed its virulence is incurable.

"The arrowlets prepared with this poison are not, by the Makasser soldiers, shot with a bow, but blown from certain blow-pipes (uit zekere spatten gespat); just as here, in the country, people shoot birds by blowing round pellets of clay.

"They can with these in still weather hit their mark at a distance of 4 rods.

"They say the Macassers themselves know no remedy against this poison . . . for the poison presses swiftly into the blood and vital spirits, and causes a violent inflammation. They hold (however) that the surest remedy for this poison is . . ." (and so on, repeating the antidote already mentioned).—Joan Nieuhof's Zee en Land Reize, etc., pp. 217-218.

c. 1681. "Arbor Toxicaria, Ipo.

"I have never yet met with any poison more horrible and hateful, produced by any vegetable growth, than that which is derived from this lactescens tree.

Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone-cast, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow; the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were . . . and the atmosphere about it is so polluted and poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead * * * all things perish which are touched by its emanations, inasmuch that every animal shuns it and keeps away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it.

"No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen . . . for Death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree . . ." (He then tells of a venomous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree). * * *

"The Malays call it Cayu Upas, but in Macassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

"It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it."

—Rumphii Herbarium Amboinense, ii. 263-268.

1685. "I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, H. Cornelius Spielman . . . The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and wounding with these, inasmuch that if the skin be but slightly scratched the wounded die in a twinkling."

(Then the old story of the only antidote).

. . . . .
The account follows extracted from the Journal.

"There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is of highest quality * * * From the princes (or Rajas) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass nor any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bruise or cut made in the bark of those trees, oozing out as sap does from plants that afford milky juices . . . When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the joints become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboos, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it speedily hardens."—Dn. Corn. 1783. "The following description of the BOHON UPAS, or POISON TREE, which grows in the Island of Java, and renders it unwholesome by its noxious vapours, has been procured for the London Magazine, from Mr. Heydinger, who was employed to translate it from the original Dutch, by the author, Mr. Foersch, who, we are informed, is at present abroad, in the capacity of surgeon on board an English vessel . . .

"In the year 1774, I was stationed at Batavia, as a surgeon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company. During my residence there I received several different accounts of the Bohon-Upas, and the violent effects of its poison. They all then seemed incredible to me, but raised my curiosity in so high a degree, that I resolved to investigate this subject thoroughly . . . I had procured a recommendation from an old Malayan priest to another priest, who lives on the nearest habitable spot to the tree, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles distant. The letter proved of great service to me on my undertaking, as that priest is appointed by the Emperor to reside there, in order to prepare for eternity the souls of those who, for different crimes, are sentenced to approach the tree, and to procure the poison * * * Malefactors, who, for their crimes, are sentenced to die, are the only persons to fetch the poison; and this is the only chance they have of saving their lives . . . They are then provided with a silver or tortoise-shell box, in which they are to put the poisonous gum, and are properly instructed how to proceed, while they are upon their dangerous expedition. Among other particulars, they are always told to attend to the direction of the winds; as they are to go towards the tree before the wind, so that the effluvia from the tree are always blown from them * * * They are afterwards sent to the house of the old priest, to which place they are commonly attended by their friends and relations. Here they generally remain some days, in expectation of a favourable breeze. During that time the ecclesiastic prepares them for their future fate by prayers and admonitions. When the hour of their departure arrives the priest puts them on a long leather cap with two glasses before their eyes, which comes down as far as their breast, and also provides them with a pair of leather gloves . . .

Nor towering plantain shades the mid-day vales,

No step retreating, on the sand impress'd,

Upper Roger. This happy example of the Hobson-Jobson dialect occurs in a letter dated 1755, from Capt. Jackson at Syrian in Burma, which is given in Dalrymple's Oriental Repertory, i. 192. It is a corruption of the Sansk. yuvārāja, ‘young King,’ the Cæsar or Heir Apparent, a title borrowed from ancient India by most of the Indo-Chinese monarchies, and which we generally render in Siam as the ‘Second King.’

Urz and Urzee, and vulgarly Urjee, s. P. Hind. ‘arz’ and ‘arzī’, from Ar. ‘arz’, the latter a word having an extraordinary variety of uses even for Arabic. A petition or humble representation either oral or in writing; the technical term for a request from an inferior to a superior; ‘a suffocation’ as one of Sir Walter Scott's characters calls it. A more elaborate form is ‘arz-dāsh’ = ‘memorializing.’ This is used in a very barbarous form of Hobson-Jobson below.

1606. “Every day I went to the Court, and in every eightene or twentie dayes I put up Ars or Petitions, and still he put mee off with good words . . .”—John Mildenhall, in Purchas, i. (Bk. iii.) 115.

Varella, s. This is a term constantly applied by the old Portuguese writers to the pagodas of Indo-China and China. Of its origin we have no positive evidence. The most probable etymology is that it is the Malay barāhlā or brāhlā, 'an idol.' An idol temple is rūmah-barāhlā, 'a house of idols,' but barāhlā alone may have been used elliptically by the Malays or misunderstood by the Portuguese. We have an analogy in the double use of pagoda for temple and idol.

1555. "Their temples are very large edifices, richly wrought, which they call Valeras, and which cost a great deal . . ."

—Account of China in a Jesuit's Letter appended to Fr. Alvarez H. of Ethiopia, translated by Mr. Major in his Introd. to Mendoza, Hak. Soc., i. xlviii.

1569. "Gran quantità se ne consuma ancora in quel Regno nelle lor Varelle, che sono gli suo' pagodi, de' quali ve n'è gran quantità di grandi e di picciole, e sono alcune montagnuole fatte a mano, a giusa d'un pan di zuccaro, e alcune d'esse alte quant' il campanile di S. Marco di Venetia . . . si consuma in queste istesse varelle anco gran quantità di oro di foglia . . ."—Ces. Federici, in Ramus., iii. 395.

1583. "... nauigammo fin la mattina, che ci trouammo alla Bara giusto di Negrais, che così si chiama in lor linguaggio il porto, che va in Pegu, oue discoprimmo a banda sinistra del riuo vn pagodo, ouer varella tutta dorata, la quale si scopre di lontano da' vascelli, che vengono d'alto mare, et massime quando il Sol percore in quell' oro, che la fa risplendere al' intorno . . ."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 92.*

1587. "They consume in these Varellaes great quantitie of Golde; for that they be all gilded aloft."—Fitch, in Hak., ii. 393.

1614. "So also they have many Varelas, which are monasteries in which dwell their religiosos, and some of these are very sumptuous, with their roofs and pinnacles all gilded."—Couto, VI. vii. 9.

More than one prominent geographical feature on the coast-navigation to China was known by this name. Thus in Linschoten's description of the route from Malacca to Macao, he mentions at the entrance to the 'Straits of Sincapura,' a rock having the appearance of an obelisk, called the Varella del China; and again, on the eastern coast of Champa, or Cochin China, we have frequent notice of a point (with a river also) called that of the Varella. Thus in Pinto:

* Compare this vivid description with a modern notice of the same pagoda:

1855. "This meridian range . . . 700 miles from its origin in the Naga wilds . . . sinks in the sea hard by Negrais, its last bluff crowned by the golden Pagoda of Modon, gleaming far to seaward, a Burmese Sunium."—Mission to Ava, 272. There is a small view of it in this work.

1540. "The Friday following we found ourselves just against a River called by the inhabitants of the Country Tinacoreu, and by us (the) Varella."—Pinto (in Cogan), p. 48.

This Varella of Champa is also mentioned by Linschoten:

1598. "... from this thirde point to the Varella the coast runneth North ... This Varella is a high hill reaching into the Sea, and above on the toppe it hath a verie high stonie rock, like a tower or pillar, which may be seen far off, therefore it is by the Portingalles called Varella."—p. 342.

Vedas. The Sacred Books of the Brahmins, Veda being 'knowledge.' Of these books there are nominally four, viz., the Rig, Yajur, Sāma, and Atharva Vedas.

The earliest direct intimation of knowledge of the existence of the Vedas appears to be in the book called De Tribus Impostoribus, said to have been printed in 1598, in which they are mentioned.* Possibly this knowledge came through the Arabs.

Though thus we do not trace back any direct allusion to the Vedas in European books, beyond the year 1600 or thereabouts, there seems good reason to believe that the Jesuit missionaries had information on the subject at a much earlier date.

St. Francis Xavier had frequent discussions with Brahmins, and one went so far as to communicate to him the mantra "Om śrīnārāyaṇanāmah." In 1559 a learned Brahman at Goa was converted by Father Belchior Carneiro, and baptized by the name of Manuel. He afterwards (with the Viceroy's sanction!) went by night and robbed a Brahman on the mainland who had collected many MSS., and presented the spoil to the Fathers, with great satisfaction to himself and them.†

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Roman below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated 31st January, 1623, there is mention of rites called Haiteres and Tandie, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Aitareya and Tāṇḍya (see Norbert, i. 39). Lucena's allusion below to the "four parts" of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India.

In course of time however what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about 'Beids of the Shaster'! (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of 'the Four Beids' (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam, or Veidam. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during last century in France from Voltaire's having constituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him l'Ézour Vedam, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purana, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de' Nobili) to introduce Christian doctrines; but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Sonnerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Researches, xi.).

The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.).

Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century, write Bede, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bed. Both forms, Bed and Vedam, are known to Fleury, as we see below.

Vellard, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. vallado, 'a mound or embankment.'

1809. "At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. . . . The vellard was begun A.D. 1797, and finished in 1806, at an expense of 50,575 rupees."—Maria Graham, 8.

Vellore, n. p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of last century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1806. The etym. of the name Vellūr is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Velur, 'the town of the lance'; and Col. Branfill as 'Vēlūr, from Vēl, a benefit, benefaction.'

Vendu-Master, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind.

1781. From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears to have been an euphemism for Auctioneer.

"Mr. Donald . . . begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendu business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams."—India Gazette, July 28th.

1793. "The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendu Master is to have the superintendence and management of all Sales at the Presidency."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 99.

At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by "G. Williamson, Vendu Master."

Venetian, s. This is sometimes in books of last and preceding century used for Sequins (see under Chick).

1675. Fryer gives, among coins and weights at Goa :

"The Venetian . . . 18 Tangeos, 30 Rees." p. 206.

1752. "At this juncture a gold mohur is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 4½ Arcot Rupees."—In Long, p. 32.

Veranda, s. An open pillared gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds almost equally plausible.

Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has been sometimes alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar :

"Ce mot (vérande) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan beramada, perche, terrasse, balcon."—C. Defrémery in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem., p. 64.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not however possible that beramada, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Sansk. Dict. (1872), gives "varaṇḍa . . . a veranda, a portico . . ." Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. baranda, 'portico,' Bengali bārāṇḍā, Hind. varāṇḍā, adding : "Most of our wiseacre litera- teurs (qu. littérateurs?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. barāmadaḥ, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit" (i. 153). Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr. Beames was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambiguous; but we shall not call him the "wise-acre grammarian." Varaṇḍa, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Litré also gives as follows (1874):—

"Ετυμ. Verandah, mot rapporté de l'Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégénérescence, dans les langues modernes de l'Inde, du Sansc. veranda, colonnade, de var, couvrir."

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English from India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite independently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in P. de Alcalá can leave no doubt on the subject.

1498. "E vëo ter commosco onde estavam lançados, em huma varanda onde estava hum grande castiçal d'arame que nos alumava."—Rotetiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 2d ed., 1861, p. 62.

i.e. "... and came to join us where we had been put in a varanda, where there was a great candlestick of brass that gave us light..."

And Correa, speaking of the same historical passage, though writing at a later date:

"When the Captain-major arrived, he was conducted through many courts and verandas (muitos pateos e varandas) to a dwelling opposite that in which the king was..."—Correa, by Stanley, 193, compared with original Lendas, I. i. 98.

1505. In Pedro de Alcalá's Spanish-Arabic Vocabulary we have:

"Varandas—Tārḡuḥ."

"Varandas assi ḥārḡaba, ḥārḡab."

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that tārḡuḥ is, according to Dozy (Suppl. I. 430), dārḡūz, itself taken from dārābāzin (παράβειον), 'a stair-railing, fire-guard, balcony, &c.'; whilst ḥārḡab stands for sarjāb, a variant (Abul W., p. 735, i.) of the commoner sharjāb, 'a lattice, or anything latticed,' such as a window,—'a balcony, a balustrade.'

1540. "This said, we entred with her into an outward court, all about invironed with Galleries (cercado a roda de duas ordens de varandas) as if it had been a Cloister of Religious persons..."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxxxiii.), in Cogan, 102.

1553 (but relating events of 1511).

"... assentou Afonso d'Albuquerque com elles, que primeiro que sahissem em terra, irem ao seguinte dia, quando agua estivesse estofa, dez bateis a queimar alguns baileus, que são como varandas sobre o mar."—Barros, II. vi. 3.

1563. "R. . . nevertheless tell me what the tree is like. O. From this varanda you can see the trees in my garden: those little ones have been planted two years, and in four they give excellent fruit..."—Garcia, f. 112.

1602. "De maneira, que quando ja El Rey (de Pegu) chegava, tinha hums formosos Paços de muitas camaras, varandas, retretes, cozinhas, em que se recolhia com suas mulheres..."—Couto, Dec. vi., Liv. vii., cap. viii.

1611. "Varanda. Lo entreado de los corredores, por ser como varas, per otro nombre vareastes quasi varafustes."—Cobarruvias.

1631. In Haex, Malay-Latin Vocabulary, we have as a Malay word, "Baranda, Contignatio vel Solarium."

1644. "The fort (at Cochin) has not now the form of a fortress, consisting all of houses; that in which the captain lives has a Varanda fronting the river, 15 paces long and 7 wide..."—Bocarro, MS., f. 313.

1710. "There are not wanting in Cambaya great buildings with their courts, varandas, and chambers."—De Sousa, Oriente Conquist., ii. 152.

1711. "The Building is very ancient. . . and has a paved Court, two large Verandas or Piazzas."—Lockyer, 20.

c. 1714. "Varanda. Obra sacada do corpo do edificio, cuberta o descuberta, na qual se costuma passear, tomar o sol, o fresco, etc."—Pergula."—Bluteau, sub voce.

1729. "Baranda. Especie de corredor o balaustrada que ordinariamente se collocá debante de los altares o escaléras, compuesta de balaustres de hierro, bronce, madera, o otra materia, de la altura de un medio cuerpo, y su uso es para adorno y reparo. Algunos escriven esta voce con b. Lat. Peribolus, Lorica clathrata."—Gottis, Hist. de Nueva España, lib. 3, cap. 15. "Alajábase la pieza por la mitad con un baranda o biombo que sin impedir la vista señalava termino al concorso."—Dicc. de la Ling. Cast. por la R. Acad.

* This last remark is due to A. B.

1754. Ives, in describing the Cave of Elephanta, speaks twice of "the voranda or open gallery."—p. 45.

1756. "... as soon as it was dark, we were all, without distinction, directed by the guard set over us to collect ourselves into one body, and sit down quietly under the arched Veranda, or Piazza, to the west of the Black-hole prison..."—Holwell's Narrative of the Black Hole.

c. 1760. "... Small ranges of pillars that support a pent-house or shed, forming what is called, in the Portuguese lingua-franca, Verandas."—Grose, i. 53.

1781. "On met sur le devant une petite galerie appelée varangue, et formée par le toit."—Sonnerat, i. 54.

There is a French nautical term, varangue, 'the ribs or floor-timbers of a ship,' which seems to have led this writer astray here.

1783. "You are conducted by a pretty steep ascent up the side of a rock, to the door of the cave, which enters from the North. By it you are led first of all into a feerandah (!) or piazza which extends from East to West 60 feet."—Acct. of some Artificial Caves in the Neighbourhood of Bombay (Elephanta), by Mr. W. Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies. In Archaeologia, vii. 287.

"The other gate leads to what in this country is called a veranda or feranda (printed seranda), which is a kind of piazza or landing-place before you enter the hall."—Letter (on Caves of Elephanta, &c.), from Hector Macneil, Esq., in Archaeologia, viii. 254.

1796. "... Before the lowest (storey) there is generally a small hall supported by pillars of teka wood, which is of a yellow colour and exceedingly hard. This hall is called varanda, and supplies the place of a parlour."—Fra Paolino, Eng. trans.

1809. "In the same verandah are figures of natives of every cast and profession."—Ld. Valentia, i. 424.

1810. "The viranda keeps off the too great glare of the sun, and affords a dry walk during the rainy season."—Maria Graham, 21.

c. 1816. "... and when Sergeant Browne bethought himself of Mary, and looked to see where she was, she was conversing up and down the verandah, though it was Sunday, with most of the rude boys and girls in the barracks."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, p. 47, ed. 1873.

Verdure, s. This word appears to have been used in the last century for vegetables, adapted from the Port. verduras.

1752. Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find :

RS. A. P.

"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10 6."

Vidana, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s. v. vidān). It is apparently from the Sanskrit Vadana ... "the act of speaking ... the mouth, face, countenance ... the front, point," etc. In Javanese wadana (or wadono, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank; a Javanese title" (Crawford, s. v.). The Javanese title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Athenæum of 1st April, 1882, p. 413, and of 13th May, id. p. 602). The derivation given by Alwis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1681. "The Dissauvas by these Courli vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mulcts upon them ... In Fine this officer is the Dissauva's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Knox, p. 51.

1726. "Vidanes, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes ..."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1856. "Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called Vidāna-Aratchies and Vidāns. The last is derived from the word (vidāna), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 647) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."—J. de Alwis, in Ceylon Journal, 8, p. 237.

Vihara, Wihare, &c., s. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Sansk. viḥārā, a Buddhist convent,—originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minster has come from monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist viḥārās in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places; e.g. Behār, and the great province which takes its name; Kuch Behār; the Vihār water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Bolehārā itself.

1681. "The first and highest order of priests are the Trinannaxes, who are the priests of the Buddou God. Their temples are styled Vehars ... These ... only live in the Vihar, and enjoy great Revenues."—Knox, Ceylon, 74.

1877. "Twice a month, when the rules of the order are read, a monk who had broken them is to confess his crime; if it be slight, some slight penance is laid upon him, to sweep the court-yard of the wihāra, sprinkle the dust round the sacred bo-tree."—Rhys Davids, Buddhism, 169.

Viss, s. A weight in use in S. India and in Burma. Tam. visai. In Madras it was  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a Madras maund, and = 3lb. 2oz. avoirdupois. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pollam, 40 pollams = 1 viss, 8 viss = 1 maund (of 25lbs), 20 maunds = 1 candy. In Burma the viss = 100 tikals, = 3lbs. 5  $\frac{1}{2}$ z. Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight peik-tha, probably a corruption of visai.

1554. "The baar of Pegu contains 120 bigas; each biga weighs 40 ounces; the biga contains 100 ticals; the tical weighs  $3\frac{1}{2}$  oitavas."—A. Nunes, 38.

1568. "This Ganza goeth by weight of Byze . . . and commonly a Byza of Ganza is worth (after our account) halfe a ducat."—Caesar Frederike, in Hak., ii. 367.

1626. "In anno 1622 the Myne was shut up . . . the coming of the Mogull's Embassadour to this King's Court, with his peremptory demand of a Vyse of the fairest diamonds, caused the cessation."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1003.

1855. "The King last year purchased 800,000 viss of lead, at five tikals for 100 viss, and sold it at twenty tikals."—Mission to Ava, 256.

W.

Waler, s. A horse imported from N. South Wales, or Australia in general.

1866. "Well, young shaver, have you seen the horses? How is the Waler's off foreleg?"—Trevelyan, Dawk Bungalow, 223.

1873. "For sale, a brown Waler gelding," &c.—Madras Mail, June 25th.

Wali, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way. (a) Ar. Wālī. A Mahommedan title corresponding to "Governor." It became familiar some years ago in connexion with Kandahar (1879-80). It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the Wālī.

1298. "Whenever he knew of any one who had a pretty daughter, certain ruffians of his would go to the father and say: 'What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Bailo Achmath' (for they call him the Bailo, or, as we should say, 'the Vicegerent')."—Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498. " . . . e mandou hum homem que se chama Bale, o qual he como alquaide."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 54.

1727. "As I was one Morning walking the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City [Muscat], by them called the Waaly."—A. Ham., i. 70.

(b). Arab. wālī. This is much used in some Mahommedan countries (e.g. Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by transfer for the shrine of such a saint; see under Peer.

Walla, s. This is a popular abridgment of Competition-walla, q.v., under which also will be found remarks on the termination wālā, and illustrations of its use.

Wanderoo, s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Presbytes ursinus). The name is however the generic Singhalese word for 'a monkey' (wanderu), and the same with the Hind. bandar, Sansk. vānara. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox's wanderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tennent, i. 129-130.

1681. "Monkeys . . . Some so large as our English Spaniel Dogs, of a darkish gray colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just of the same bigness, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others . . . both these sorts do but little mischief . . . This sort they call in their language Wanderow."—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 26.

1810. "I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderows, on the top of a coco-nut tree, where he was gathering nuts . . ."—Maria Graham, 97.

Wanghee, or Whangee, s. The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan.

We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin.

(1). Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulu swangy (see in vol. iv., Lib. vi. cap. vii. et seqq.). As Buluh is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning.

(2). Our friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie notes: "In the K'ang-hi tze-tien, 118, 119, the Huang-tchu is described as follows: 'A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.' See also Wells Williams, Syllabic Dict. of the Chinese Lang., p. 251."

Water-Chestnut. The Trapa bispinosa of Roxb.; H. Singhara, 'the horned fruit.' See Singara.

Weaver-Bird, s. See Baya.

West-Coast, n. p. This expression in Dutch India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days.

1747. "The Revd. Mr. Francis Fordyce being entered on the Establishment . . . and having several months' allowance due to him for the West Coast, amounting to Pags. 371. 9. . . ."—Fort St. David Consn., April 30, MS. in India Office. The letter appended shows that the chaplain had been attached to Bencoolen. See also Wheeler, i. 148; and under Slave, in Supplement.

Whampoa, n. p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city.

1770. "Now all European ships are obliged to anchor at Houang-poa, three leagues from the city" (Canton).—Raynal (tr. 1777), ii. 258.

Whistling Teal. This in Jerdon is given as Dendrocygna Aewsree of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfil one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

White Ants. See Ants, White.

Winter. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that shittā in Arabic is indifferently 'winter,' or 'rain'; the winter season being the rainy season. Shittā is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: "The winter (sethāw) is past, the rain is over and gone."

1503. "R. . . In what time of the year does this disease (morzi or cholera) mostly occur?"

"O. . . . it occurs mostly in June and July (which is the winter-time in this country) . . ."—Garcia, i. 76 y.

c. 1507. "Da Bezeneger a Goa sono d'estate otto giornate di viaggio: ma noi lo facessimo di mezzo l'inverno, il mese de Luglio."—Cesare Federici, in Ram., iii. 389.

1583. "Il uerno in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio, e Agosto, e il resto dell' anno è state. Ma bene è da notare che qui la stagione nō si può chiamar uerno rispetto al freddo, che nō vi regna mai, mà solo per cagione de' venti, e delle gran piogge . . ."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 67 v.

1584. "Note that the Citie of Goa is the principall place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beginneth the 15 of May, with very great raine."—Barret, in Hak., ii. 413.

1610. "The Winter heere beginneth about the first of Iune and dureth till the twentieth of September, but not with continuall raine as at Goa, but for some sixe or seuen dayes every change and full, with much wind, thunder, and raine."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 423.

c. 1610. "L'hyver commence au mois d'Avril, et dure six mois."—Pyrard de La-val, i. 78.

1643. ". . . des Galiottes (qui sortent tous les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares . . . et cela est enuiron la My-Septembre, lors que leur hyuer est passé . . ."—Mocquet, 347.

1665. "L'hyver se fait sentir. El comença en Juin par quantité de pluies et de tonnerres."—Thevenot, v. 311.

1678. ". . . . In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a Mumjuma, or Wax Cloth to throw over it . . ."—Fryer, 410.

1691. "In orā Occidentali, quae Malabarorum est, hyems a mense Aprili in Septembrem usque dominatur: in littore verò Orientali, quod Hollandi de Just but Choramundel, Oram Coromandellicae vocant, trans illos montes, in iisdem latitudinis gradibus, contrariò planè modò à Septembri usque ad Aprilem hyemem habent."—Iohi Ludolphi, ad suam Historiam Commentarius, 101.

1770. "The mere breadth of these mountains divides summer from winter, that is to say, the season of fine weather from the rainy. . . all that is meant by winter in India is the time of the year when the clouds . . . are driven violently by the winds against the mountains," &c.—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 34.

Wood-apple, s. A wild fruit of the Order Aurantiaceae growing in all the drier parts of India (Feronia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see bael) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopoeia it is sometimes substituted (Moodeen Sherif).

1875. "Once upon a time it was announced that the Pádsháh was about to pass through a certain remote village of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in pancháyat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazrána. One was the custard-apple, the other was the wood-apple . . . a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon or small citron converted into wood. After many pros and cons, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salám, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive language at being stopped to receive such trash, pelted the simpletons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squashed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking heaven that the offering had not been of wood-apples!"—Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geograph. Magazine, 1875, pp. 49-50.

The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule (see p. 705, supra).

Wood-oil, or Gurjun Oil. Hind. Garjan. A thin balsam drawn from a great forest tree (N. O. Dipterocarpeae). Dipterocarpus turbinatus, Gaertn. and from several other species of Dipt., which are among the finest trees of Transgangetic India. Trees of this N. O. abound also in the Malay Archipelago, whilst almost unknown in other parts of the world. The celebrated Borneo camphor is the product of one such tree; and the Sál timber of India of another. Much wood-oil is exported from the Burmese provinces, the Malay Peninsula, and Siam. It is much used in the East as a natural varnish and preservative of timber; and in Indian hospitals it is employed as a substitute for copaiva (Hanbury & Flückiger). The first mention we know of is c. 1759 in Dalmrymple's Or. Repertory, in a list of Burma products (i. 109).

Woolock or Oolock, s. (qu. Hind. holá, or holák, or ulák?) A bulky cargo-boat in use on the Ganges, sometimes of 40 or 50 tons burthen and more. The ulák is not "clinker-built," but with the planks edge to edge, and fastened with iron cramps like stitches.

1679. "Messrs. Vincent" (etc.) . . . "met the Agent (on the Hoogly R.) in Budgeroes and Oolankes."—Fort St. George Consultations, 14th Sept. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871.

1764. "Then the Manjees went after him in a woolock to look after him."—In Long, 383.

1781. "The same day will be sold a twenty-oar'd Woolock-built Budgerow . . ."—India Gazette, April 14th.

Woordy-Major, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of wardi, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. wardi or urdi, 'uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,' as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology. But there is also Ar. wird, 'a flight of birds,' and then also 'a troop or squadron,' which is perhaps as probable.

Wootz, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself in books to the (so-called) 'natural steel' of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay.

The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11th, 1795, called: "Experiments and observations to investigate the nature of a kind of Steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there called Wootz . . . by George Pearson. M.D." This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for wook, representing the Canarese ukku (pron. wukku) 'steel.'

Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Balfour. He states that uchcha and nicha (Hind. in reality for 'high' and 'low') are used in Canarese-speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of uchcha, 'of superior quality.' The former suggestion seems to us preferable.

The article was no doubt the famous 'Indian Steel,' the σίδηρος Ἰνδικὸς καὶ στόμα of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the alhinde of old Spanish, the hundwān of the Persian traders, ondanque of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Baticala (Bhatkal) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goa Government in 1591 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archivo Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, 318).

1795. "Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and is in high esteem among the Indians."—Philos. Transactions for 1795, Pt. II., p. 322.

1841. "The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. . . . It may be rendered self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids. . . . it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades (of Damascus) were made of this steel."—Wilkinson, Engines of War, pp. 203-206.

1864. "Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the wootz of India."—Percy's Metallurgy, Iron and Steel, 860.

Writer, s. (a). The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E. I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b). A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

Wug, s. We give this Belûch word for loot (q.v.) on the high authority quoted.

1845. "In one hunt after wug, as the Beloochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C. Napier, in Life, iii. 298.

X

Xerafine, Xerafim, &c., s. The word in this form represents a silver coin, formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1s. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 reis.

But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafî (or sharifî, 'noble'—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dinâr, but was also in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mohr. Ashrafî for a gold dinâr (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the original of the '1001 Nights,' as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 353-354). Aigrefin, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littré also a corruption of ashrafî.

1498. "And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if he wished to go he must give him 600 xarifes, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither."—Roteiro de V. da G., 79.

1510. "When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amirra, says to him: 'Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Damascus, and I will give you 100,000 or 200,000 teraphim of gold.'"—Varthema, 10.

"Every Mameluke, great or little, has for his pay six saraphi per month."—Id. 13.

"Our captain sent for the superior of the said mosque, to whom he said: that he should show him the body of Nabi—this Nabi means the Prophet Mahomet—that he would give him 3000 seraphim of gold."—Id. 29.

This one eccentric traveller gives thus three different forms.

1513. "... hunc regem Affonsus idem, urbe opulētissima et præcipuo emporio Armusio vi capto, quindecim milii Seraphinorū, ea est aurea moneta ducatis equivalēs annuū nobis tributarii effecerat."—Epistola Emmanuelis Regis, 2 b.

In the preceding the word seems to apply to the gold dinâr.

1610. "Inprimis of Seraffins Echeri, which be ten Rupias a piece, there are sixtie Leckes."—Hawkins in Purchas, i. 217.

c. 1610. "Les pièces d'or sont cherafins à vingt-cinq sols piece."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 40.

1523. "And by certain information of persons who knew the facts . . . Antonio de Saldanha . . . agreed with the said King Turuxa (Turun Shāh), . . . that the said King . . . should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xarafins more yearly . . . in all 25,000 xarafins."—Tombo da India, Subsídios, 79.

c. 1844. "Sahibs now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Lat Lik Sahib (Lord Lake) the sahibs would give an ashrafi, when now they think twice before taking out a rupee."—Personal Reminiscence of an old Khamsama's Conversation.

In these four last quotations the gold mohr is meant.

1598. "The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardaune Xeraphin. It is of silver, but of small value. They strike it at Goa, and it is marked on one side with the image of St. Sebastian, on the other with 3 or 4 arrows in a sheaf. It is worth 3 testoons or 300 Reys of Portugal, more or less."—Linschoten (from French ed. 71).

c. 1675. "Coins . . . of Rajapore. Imaginary Coins. The Pagod is 3½ Rupees. 48 Juttals (see Jeetul) is one Pagod. 10 and ½ Larees is 1 Pagod. Zeraphins 2½, 1 Old Dollar.

"Coins and weights of Bombaim. 3 Larees is 1 Zeraphin. 80 Raies 1 Laree. 1 Pice is 10 Raies. The Raies are Imaginary.

"Coins and weights in Goa. . . . The Cruzado of gold, 12 Zeraphins. The Zeraphin, 5 Tangoes. The Tango, 5 Vintens. The Vinteen, 15 Barrocks, whereof 75 make a Tango. And 60 Rees make a Tango."—Fryer, 206.

1727. "Their Soldiers Pay (at Goa) is very small and ill paid. They have but six Xerapheens per Month, and two Suits of Calico, stript or chequered, in a Year . . . and a Xerapheen is worth about sixteen Pence half Penny Ster."—A. Ham, i. 249

1760. "You shall coin Gold and silver of equal weight and fineness with the Ash-refees and Rupees of Moorshedabad, in the name of Calcutta."—Nawab's Pervannah for Establ. of a Mint in Calcutta, in Long, p. 227.

Y.

Yaboo, s. Pers. yābū. A nag such as we call 'a galloway,' a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

1754. "There are in the highland country of KANDAHAR and CABUL a small kind of horses called Yabous, which are very serviceable."—Hanway's Travels, ii. 367.

Yak, s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunniens, L., Poëphagus of Gray), belonging to the Bisonino group of Bovinae. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind. name chāuri gāo, chāoris (chowries) having been usually called "cow-tails" in last century. The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow,' nor is it found in the 3d ed. of Pennant's H. of Quadrupeds (1793), though there is a fair account of the animal as the Bos grunniens of Lin., and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, its first appearance in print was, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. gyak. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aelian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in mediæval times described by Rubruk (see Supplement).

The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burthen, and is much ridden. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokand to Kuku-khotan or Kwei-hwachang, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

c. A.D. 250. "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned oryxes, and cattle of two different races, one kind of great swiftness, and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle from (the tails of) which they make fly-flaps. . . ."—Aelian, De Animalibus, xv. cap. 14.

Again :

"There is in India a grass-eating* animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour.† The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. . . . When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket . . . and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that its tail is the great object of fancy."—Ibid. xvi. 11.

c. 545. "This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Tupha, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and pennons. They tell of this beast that if his tail catches in a tree he will not budge but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of his tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off, and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape !"—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transl. in Cathay, p. clxxiv.

1730. "Dopo di che per circa 40 giorni di camino non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mandre di Iak, ossia bovini pelosi, pecore, cavalli. . . ."—Fra Oratio della Penna di Billi, Breve Notizia del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Journ. As., 2d ser.) p. 17.

1783. ". . . on the opposite side saw several of the black chowry-tailed cattle. . . . This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. . . . The Yak of Tartary, called Soorā Goy ‡ in Hindostan. . . ."—Turner's Embassy (publ. 1800), 185-6.

In the publication at the latter date appears the excellent plate after Stubbs, called "the Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of this animal. See also Zobo.

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce :

1851. "Les bœufs à long poils étaient de véritables caricatures; impossible de figurer rien de plus drôle; ils marchaient les jambes écartées, et portaient pénible-

* Πονόγυος, whence no doubt Gray took his name for the genus.

† The tails usually brought for sale are those of the tame Yak, and are white. The tail of the wild Yak is black, and of much greater size.

ment un énorme système de stalactites, qui leur pendaient sous le ventre jusqu'à terre. Ces pauvres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glaçons qu'il semblaient qu'on les eût mis confire dans du sucre candi."—Huc et Gabet, Souvenirs d'un Voyage, &c., ii. 201.

1851. "Au moment où nous passâmes le Mourou Oussou sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nous avions remarqué de loin . . . des objets informes et noirs rangés en file en travers de ce grand fleuve. . . . Ce fut seulement quand nous fûmes tout près, que nous pûmes reconnaître plus de 50 bœufs sauvages incrustés dans la glace. Ils avaient voulu, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la concretion des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glaçons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tête, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore à découvert; mais le reste du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on eût dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aigles et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux."—Ibid. ii. 219.

Yam, s. This general English name of the large edible tuber Dioscorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the West Indies at the time of the discovery.

1600. "There are great store of Iniamas growing in Guinea, in great fields."—In Purchas, ii. 957.

1613. ". . . . Moreover it produces great abundance of inhames, or large subterranean tubers, of which there are many kinds, like the camottes of America, and these inhames boiled or roasted serve in place of bread."—Godinho de Eredia, 19.

1764.

"In meagre lands
Tis known the Yam will ne'er to bigness swell." Grainger, Bk. i.

Z.

Zabita, s. Hind. from Ar. zābitū. An exact rule, a canon, but in the following it seems to be used for a tariff of assessment:

1799. "I have established the Zabeta for the shops in the Fort as fixed by Macleod. It is to be paid annually."—Wellington, i. 49.

Zamorin, s. The title for many centuries of the Hindu Sovereign of Calicut and the country round. The word is Malayāl. Tāmāiri, tāmūri, a tadhbava (or vernacular modification) of Sāmundri, 'the Sea-King.' (See also Wilson, Mackenzie MSS. i. xcvi.).

c. 1348. "The sultan is a Kāfir called the Sāmari. . . . When the time of our departure for China came the sultan, the Sāmari equipped for us one of the 13 junks which were lying in the port of Calicut."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 89-94.

1442. "I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sāmari. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XVth Cent., 17.

1498. "First Calicut whither we went. . . . The King whom they call Camolim (for Zamorim) can muster 100,000 men for war, with the contingents that he receives, his own authority extending to very few."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama.

1510. "Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut, because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samory, which in the Pagan language means God on earth."*—Varthema, 134.

1516. "This city of Calicut is very large . . . . This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomodri, which is a point of honour above all other Kings."—Barbosa, 103.

1553. "The most powerful Prince of this Malebar was the King of Calicut, who par excellence was called Camarij, which among them is as among us the title Emperor."—Barros, I, iv. 7.

1554. "I wrote him a letter to tell him . . . . that, please God, in a short time the imperial fleet would come from Egypt to the Sāmari, and deliver the country from the hands of the infidels."—Sidi 'Alī, p. 83.

1563. "And when the King of Calicut (who has for title Samorim or Emperor) besieged Cochin . . ."—Garcia, f. 58 b.

"Sentado o Gama junto ao rico leito
Os seus mais afastados, prompto em vista Estava o Samori no trajo, e geyto
Da gente, nunca dantes delle vista."
Camões, vii. 59.

By Burton: .

"When near that splendid couch took place the guest and others further off, prompt glance and keen the Samorin cast on folk whose garb and gest were like to nothing he had ever seen."

1616. Under this year there is a note of a Letter from Underecon-Cheets the Great Samorin or K. of Calicut to K. James.—Sainsbury, i. 462.

* The Traveller confounds the word with tam-buran, which does mean 'Lord'.

1673. "Indeed it is pleasantly situated under Trees, and it is the Holy Sec of their Zamerhin or Pope."—Fryer, 52.

1781. "Their (the Christians') hereditary privileges were respected by the Zamorin himself."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1785. A letter of Tipoo's applies the term to a tribe or class, speaking of '2000 Samories;' who are these?—Select Letters, 274.

1787. "The Zamorin is the only ancient sovereign in the South of India."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 59.

1810. "On our way we saw one of the Zamorin's houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Paniany."—Maria Graham, 110.

1814. "... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorine's complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrance vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brahmins."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 207-8.

—This was a case of traga (q.v.).

Zanzibar, n. p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jubb, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 15th century, as we see from the Roteiro.

The Zang̃s-bār (Pers.) 'Region of the Blacks,' was known to the ancients in the forms Zingis and Zingium. The Arab softening of the g made the name into Zanjībār, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 545. "And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zingium, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the incense grows, which is called Barbary."—Cosmas in Cathay, clxvii.

c. 940. "The land of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nile" (by this the Jubb seems meant) "and extends to the country of Sofāla and of the Wak-Wak."—Mas'ūdi, Prairies d'Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190. Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

"... I have never seen better food than this!

Since a man of Zang is in eating so heart-attracting,

To eat any other roast meat to me is not agreeable!"

Sikandar-Nāmāh of Nizāmi, by Wilberforce Clarke, p. 104.

1298. "Zanghibar is a great and noble Island, with a compass of some 2000 miles.

The people . . . are all black, and go stark naked, with only a little covering for decency. Their hair is as black as pepper, and so frizzily that even with water you can scarcely straighten it, &c., &c."—Marco Polo, ii. 215.

(Marco Polo regards the coast of Zanzibar as belonging to a great island like Madagascar.)

1440. "Kalikut is a very safe haven . . . where one finds in abundance the precious objects brought from maritime countries, especially from Habshah (see Hubshee; and Abyssinia in Supplement), Zirbād (q.v.), and Zanzibar."—Abdurrazak, in Not. et Extraits, xiv. 436.

1498. "And when the morning came, we found we had arrived at a very great island called Jangiber, peopled with many Moors, and standing good ten leagues from the coast."—Roteiro, 105.

1516. "Between this island of San Lorenzo (i. e., Madagascar) and the continent, not very far from it are three islands, which are called one Manfia, another Zanzibar, and the other Penda; these are inhabited by Moors; they are very fertile islands."—Barbosa, 14.

1553. "And from the streams of this river Quilimance towards the west, as far as the Cape of Currents, up to which the Moors of that coast do navigate, all that region, and that still further west towards the Cape of Good Hope (as we call it), the Arabians and Persians of those parts call Zanguebar, and the inhabitants they call Zanguy."—Barros, I., viii. 4.

A few pages later we have "Isles of Pemba, Zanzibar, Monfia, Comoro," showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguebar the continental region from Zanzibar the Island.

c. 1586.

"And with my power did march to Zanzibar

The western (sic) part of Afric, where I view'd

The Ethiopian Sea, rivers, and lakes. . ."

Marlowe's Tamburlane the Great, 2d part, i. 3.

1592. "From hence we went for the Isle of Zanzibar on the coast of Melinde, where at we stayed and wintered until the beginning of February following."—Henry May, in Hakl. iv. 53.

Zebu, s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or "Brahminy bull") of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people, as an Indian word.* The only word at all like it that we can discover is zobo (q. v.) or zhobo, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dsomo.

Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Acclimatation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and [both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia," with a great part of Africa.

c. 1772. "We have seen this small hunched ox alive . . . It was shown at the fair at Paris in 1752,† under the name of the Zébu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a species of the buffalo."—Buffon's Nat. Hist., E. T. 1807, vol. viii. 19-20; see also p. 33.

1861. "Nous savons donc positivement qu'à une époque où l'occident était encore couvert de forêts, l'orient, déjà civilisé, possédait déjà le boeuf et le Zébu; et par conséquent, c'est de l'orient que ces animaux sont sortis, pour devenir, l'un (le boeuf) cosmopolite, l'autre commun à presque toute l'Asie et à une grande partie de l'Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861.):‡

Zedoary, and Zerumbet, ss. These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The former is Arabic jadwār, the latter Pers. zaram-bāl.

There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Moodeen Sheriff says that Zedoary (Curcuma Zedoaria) is sold in most bazars under the name of Anbe-haldā, whilst jadwār, or zhadvār, is the bazar name of roots of varieties of non-poisonous aconites.

Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the "Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine" (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Aëtius, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. A.D. 540. "Zador (i.e. zedoariae), galan-gae, ligustici, seselis, cardamomi, piperis longi, piperis albi, cinnamomi, zingiberis, seminis Smyrni, caryophylli, phylli, stachyos, myrobalani, phu, costi, scordii, silphii vel laserpitii, rhei barbarici, poeoniae; alii etiam arboris nucis viscum et paliuri semen, itemque saxifragum ac casiam addunt: ex his singulis stateres duos commisceto. . . ."

c. 1400. "Canell and setewale of price."
—R. of the Rose.

1516. "In the Kingdom of Calicut there grows much pepper . . . and much very good ginger of the country, cardamoms, myrobalans of all kinds, bamboo canes, zerumba, zedoary, wild cinnamon."—Barbosa, 154.

1563. "... da zedoaria faz capitulo Avicena e de Zerumbet; e isto que chamamos zedoaria, chama Avicena geiduar, e o outro nome não lhe sei, porque o não ha senão nas terras confins á China e este geiduar é uma mézinha de muito preço, e não achada senão nas mãos dos que os Gentios chamam jogues, ou outros a quem os Mouros chamam calandares."—Garcia, f. 216v-217.

Zemindar, s. Zamīn-dār, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal Proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N. W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable.

In the N. W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamīndār is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of Jamā'dār (see Jemadar), and the form given to zamīndār in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal two centuries ago.

1683. "We lay at Bogatchera, a very pleasant and delightful Country, y<sup>e</sup> Gemidar invited us ashore, and showed us Store of Deer, Peacocks, &c., but it was not our

‡ At a time when absent from facilities of reference I am indebted for these quotations from Geoffroy St. Hilaire, to an obliging communication made to Mr. Cust by M. Abel-Hovelacque. 1697. “Having tried all means with the Jemidar of the Country adjacent to us to let us have the town of De Calcutta at the usual Hire or Rent, rather than fail, having promised him  $\frac{1}{2}$  Part more than the Place at present brings him in, and all to no Purpose, he making frivolous and idle Objections, that he will not let us have any Part of the Country in the Right Honourable Company’s name, but that we might have it to our use in any of the Natives Names; the Reason he gives for it is, that the Place will be wholly lost to him—that we are a Powerful People—and that he cannot be possessed of his Country again when he sees Occasion—whereas he can take it from any of the Natives that rent any Part of his Country at his Pleasure.”

October 31st, 1698. “The Prince having given us the three towns adjacent to our Settlement, viz. De Calcutta, Chuttanutte, and Gobinapore, or more properly may be said the Jemmidarship of the said towns, paying the said Rent to the King as the Jemidars have successively done, and at the same time ordering the Jemmidar of the said towns to make over their Right and Title to the English upon their paying to the Jemidar(s) One thousand Rupees for the same, it was agreed that the Money should be paid, being the best Money that ever was spent for so great a Privilege; but the Jemmidar(s) making a great Noise, being unwilling to part with their Country . . . and finding them to continue in their averseness, notwithstanding the Prince had an officer upon them to bring them to a Compliance, it is agreed that 1,500 Rupees be paid them, provided they will relinquish their title to the said towns, and give it under their Hands in Writing, that they have made over the same to the Right Honourable Company.”—Ext. of Consultations at Chuttanutte, the 29th December (Printed for Parliament in 1788).

In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcutta is Pers. deh, ‘village’ or ‘township,’ a common term in the language of Indian revenue administration. An ‘Explanation of Terms’ furnished by W. Hastings to the Fort William Council in 1759 thus explains the word:

“Deeh—the ancient limits of any village or parish. Thus, ‘Deeh Calcutta’ means only that part which was originally inhabited.”—(In Long, p. 176.)

1871. “The Zemindars of Lower Bengal, the landed proprietary established by Lord Cornwallis, have the worst reputation as landlords, and appear to have frequently deserved it.”—Maine, Village Communities, 163.

Zenana, s. Pers. zanāna, from zan, ‘woman,’ the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are secluded. This Mahommedan custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal, and the Mahrattas.

Zanāna is also used for the women of a family themselves.

The growth of the admirable Zenana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. But we have heard of more than one instance in which the objects of this Christian enterprise have been taken to be an amiable aboriginal tribe—“the Zenanas.”

He has also carried away with him two Women, heretofore of Sujah Dowlah's Zenana; purchased by Hadjee Mustapha when last at Lucknow, one for 300 and the other for 1200 Rupees."—India Gazette, March 9th.

1786. "Their behaviour last night was so furious, that there seemed the greatest probability of their proceeding to the uttermost extremities, and that they would either throw themselves from the walls, or force open the doors of the zenanahs."—Capt. Jaques, quoted in Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vii. 27.

1789. "I have not a doubt but it is much easier for a gentleman to support a whole zenana of Indians than the extravagance of one English lady."—Munro's Narr. 50.

1790. "In a Musselman Town many complaints arise of the Passys or Toddy Collectors climbing the Trees and overlooking the Jenanas or Women's apartments of principal Natives."—Minute in a letter from Bd. of Revenue to Govt. of Bengal, 12th July.—MS. in India Office.

1809. "Musulmauns . . . even carried their depravity so far as to make secret enquiries respecting the females in their districts, and if they heard of any remarkable for beauty, to have them forcibly removed to their zenanas."—Lord Valentia, i. 415.

1817. "It was represented by the Rajah that they (the bailiffs) entered the house, and endeavoured to pass into the zenana, or women's apartments."—J. Mill, iv. 294.

1826. "The women in the zanana, in their impotent rage, flew at Captain Brown, who came off minus a considerable quantity of skin from his face."—John Shipp, iii. 49.

Zend, Zendavesta. See Supplement.

Zerbaft, s. Gold-brocade, P. zar, 'gold,' bäft, 'woven.' See under Soosie.

Zillah, s. This word is properly Ar. (in Indian pron.) 'zila,' 'a rib,' thence 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, &c., and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burma, a Deputy Commissioner.

1817. "In each district, that is, in the language of the country, each Zillah . . . a Zillah Court was established."—Mill's Hist. v. 422.

Zingari, n. p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zincari, zingani, zincali, chingari, zigeuner, etc., to the gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin.

Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixt blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varia sankara is used for an admixture of castes or races (e.g. in Bhagavad Gita, i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor would people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands.

A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. zingar, 'a saddler.' Not at all probable.

In Sleeman's Ramaseeana or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find:

"Chingaree, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Nails, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjaras, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandize, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the roomal in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsies) regards that people as the Indian Zoff (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first shikāri, and then (Pers.) changī, 'harper,' from which a plural changān actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. p. 730, note 22.

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingari, like Gipsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ab extra on their appearing in the West, and not one carried with them from Asia?

Zirbad. Pers. zīr-bād, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudān (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journal As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats "Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind." The islands "above the wind" were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind" Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu.

The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

1442. "The inhabitants of the sea coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the countries of Tchén, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XVth Cent., 6.

1553. "... Before the foundation of Malacca, in this Cingapura . . . met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Champa, Cambaja, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dybananguim (di-bāwa-angin) and Ataz Anguim (ātas-angin) which are as much as to say 'below the winds' and 'above the winds', below being West, and above East."—Barros, Dec. II., Liv. vi., cap. i.

In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, bawa-angin (or di-bāwa) 'below the wind,' and ātas (or di-ātas) angin, 'above the wind,' is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

c. 1590. "Kalanbak (calembac) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbād (?)" —Āin, i. 81.

A mistaken explanation is given in the foot-note from a native authority, but this is corrected by Prof. Blochmann at p. 616.

1726. "The Malayars are also commonly called Orang di Bawah Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Eastertlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Atas Angin, or 'people above the wind', and known as Westerlings."—Valentijn, v. 310.

1726. "The land of the Peninsula, &c., was called by the geographers Zierbaad, meaning in Persian 'beneath the wind.'" —Id. 317.

1856. "There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons. . . . The Malays call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind'. . . . The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayan countries the traders of India." —Crawford's Desc. Dict. 288.

Zobo, Zhobo, Dsomo, etc., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under Zebu. The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jaeschke's Dict. (p. 463): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of Yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzopo, a male; mdzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." This hybrid is spoken of by Marco Polo:

1298. "There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with shaggy hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Messer Marco brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of them tame, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well; and at the latter they will do full twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 57.

1854. "The Zobo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikkim), though common in the N.W. Himalaya."—Hooker's Him. Journals, 2d ed. i. 203.

Zouave, s. This modern French term is applied to certain regiments of light infantry in a quasi-oriental costume, recruited originally in Algeria, and from various races, but now only consisting of Frenchmen. The name Zuawa was according to Littré that of a Kabyle tribe of the Jurjura which furnished the first soldiers so called.

Zumbooruck, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zambūrak (spelt zanbūrak), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle;—a falconet. It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Arab. zambūr, 'a hornet'; much as 'musket' comes from mosquetta. Quatremère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge (see H. des Mongols, 285-6; see also Dozy, Suppl. s.v.).

This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation :

1848. "Les écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisades, donnent à l'arbalète, telle que l'employait les chrétiens, le nom de zenbourek. La première fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyr par Saladin en 1187 . . . Suivant l'historien des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le zenbourek était une flèche de l'épaisseur du ponce, de la longueur d'une coudée, qui avait quatre faces . . . il traversait quelque fois au même coup deux hommes placés l'un derrière l'autre . . . Les musulmans paraissent n'avoir fait usage qu'assez tard du zenbourek. Djémâl-Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 643 (1245 de J. C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l'Islamisme; c'est à propos du siège d'Ascalon par le sultan d'Egypte . . . Mais bientôt l'usage du zenbourek devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite les Turks ottomans entretenaient dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zenbourekdjis. Maintenant . . . ce mot a tout à fait changé d'acception, et l'on donne en Perse le nom de zenbourek à une petite pièce d'artillerie légère."—Reinaud, De l'Art Militaire chez les Arabes au moyen âge. Journ. As., Ser. IV., tom. xii. 211—213.

1707. "Prince Bedār Bakht . . . was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell . . . His younger brother Wālājāh was killed by a ball from a zambūrak."—Khāfi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 398.

c. 1764. "Mirza Nedjef Qhan, who was preceded by some Zemberecs, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence."—Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 250.

1825. "The reign of Futeh Allee Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour . . . He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign . . . he appeared in the field, . . . till at last one or two shots from zumboorucks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror . . ."—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khorasān in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

1846. "So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zumbooraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it."—Sir Hugh Gough's desp. on the Battle of Soobraon, dd. 13th Feby.

"The flank in question (at Su-brāon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred 'zumbooraks,' or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river."—Cunningham's Hist. of the Sikhs, 322.

Abcáree. Additional quotation :

1790. "In respect to Abkarry or Tax on Spirituous Liquors which is reserved for Taxation . . . it is evident that we cannot establish a general rate, since the quantity of consumption and expense of Manufacture, &ca., depends upon the vicinity of principal stations. For the amount leviable upon different Stills we must rely upon officers' local knowledge. The public, indeed, cannot suffer, since if a few stills are suppressed by over taxation, drunkenness is diminished."—In a Letter from Board of Revenue (Bengal) to Govt., July 12th. MS. in India Office.

Abyssinia, n. p. This geographical name is a 16-century Latinization of the Arabic Habash, through the Portuguese Aber, bearing much the same pronunciation, minus the aspirate.

A. C. (i.e. 'after compliments'). In official versions of native letters these letters stand for the omitted formalities of native compliments.

Achánoek. Two additional remarks may be relevantly made.

(1.) Job's name was certainly Charnock and not Channock. It is distinctly signed "Job Charnock" in a MS. letter from the Factory at "Chutt," i.e., Chuttanuttee (or Calcutta) in the India Office records, which I have seen.

(2.) The map in Valentijn which shows the village of Tsjannok, though published in 1726, was apparently compiled by Van den Broecke in 1662. Hence it is not probable that it took its name from Job Charnock, who seems to have entered the Company's service in 1658. When he went to Bengal we have not been able to ascertain. Also we can quote :

1677. "The ship Falcone to go up the river to Hugly, or at least to Channock."—Court's Letter to Ft. St. Geo. of 12th Decr. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1871, No. I., p. 21; see also p. 23.

1711. "Chanock-Reach hath two shoals, the upper in Chanock, and the lower on the opposite side . . . you must from below Degon as aforesaid, keep the starboard shore aboard, until you come up with a Lime-Tree . . . and then steer over with Chanock Trees and house between the 2 shoals, until you come mid-river, but no nearer the house."—The English Pilot, 55.

Adawlut. Additional.

The article in the GLOSSARY is very brief and imperfect. It seems desirable to supplement it with fuller information as to the history of the Courts. What I append here, however, applies only to the Bengal Presidency; and to the administration of justice under the Company's Courts beyond the limits of the Presidency town. Brief particulars regarding the history of the Supreme Courts and those courts which preceded them, will be found under Supreme Court in SUPPLEMENT.

The grant, by Shāh 'Alam, in 1765, of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa to the Company, transferred all power, civil and military, in those provinces, to that body. But no immediate attempt was made to undertake the direct detailed administration of either revenue or justice by the agency of the European servants of the Company. Such superintendence, indeed, of the administration was maintained in the prior acquisitions of the Company—viz. in the Zemindary of Calcutta, in the twenty-four Pergunnahs, and in the Chucklas or districts of Burdwan, Midnapoor, and Chittagong, which had been transferred by the Nawab, Kāsim 'Alī Khān, in 1760; but in the rest of the territory it was confined to the agency of a Resident at the Moorshedabad Durbar, and of a 'Chief' at Patna. Justice was administered by the Mahomedan Courts under the native officials of the Dewanny.

In 1770 European officers were appointed in the districts, under the name of Supervisors, with powers of control over the natives employed in the collection of the Revenue and the administration of justice, whilst local councils, with superior authority in all branches, were established at Moorshedabad and Patna. It was not till two years later that, under express orders from the Court of Directors, the effective administration of the provinces was undertaken by the agency of the Company's covenanted servants. At this time (1772) courts of civil justice (Mofussil Dewanny Adawlut) were established in each of the Districts then recognised. There were also District Criminal Courts (Foujdary Adawlut), held by Kāzi or Mufti, under the superintendence, like the Civil Court, of the Collectors, as the Supervisors were now styled; whilst Superior Courts (Sudder Dewanny, Sudder Nizamat, Adawlut) were established at the Presidency, to be under the superintendence of three or four members of the Council of Fort William.

In 1774 the Collectors were recalled, and native Amils appointed in their stead. Provincial Councils were set up for the divisions of Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacca, Moorshedabad, Dinapore, and Patna, in whose hands the superintendence, both of revenue collection and of the administration of civil justice, was vested, but exercised by the members in rotation.

The state of things that existed under this system was discreditably. As courts of justice the Provincial Councils were only "colourable imitations of courts, which had abdicated their functions in favour of their own subordinate (native) officers, and though their decisions were nominally subject to an appeal to the Governor-General in Council, the Appellate Court was even a more shadowy body than the Courts of first instance. The Court never sat at all, though there are some traces of its having at one time decided appeals on the report of the head of the Khalsa, or native exchequer, just as the Provincial Councils decided them on the report of the Cazis and Muftis,"*

In 1870 the Government resolved that Civil Courts, independent of the Provincial Councils, should be established in the six divisions named above,† each under a civilian judge with the title of Superintendent of the Dewanny Adawlut; whilst to the councils should still pertain the trial of causes relating to the public revenue, to the demands of zemindars upon their tenants, and to boundary questions. The appeal from the district Courts still lay to the Governor-General and his Council, as forming the Court of Sudder Dewanny; but that this might be real, a judge was appointed its head in the person of Sir Elijah Impey, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; an appointment which became famous. For it was represented as a transaction intended to compromise the acute dissensions which had been going on between that Court and the Bengal Government, and in fact as a bribe to Impey. It led, by an address from the House of Commons, to the recall of Impey, and constituted one of the charges in the abortive impeachment of that personage. Hence his charge of the Sudder Dewanny ceased in November, 1782, and it was resumed in form by the Governor-General and Council.

In 1787, the first year of Lord Cornwallis's government, in consequence of instructions from the Court of Directors, it was resolved, that with an exception as to the Courts at Moorshedabad, Patna, and Dacca, which were to be maintained independently, the office of judge in the Mofussil Courts was to be attached to that of the collection of the revenue; in fact the offices of Judge and Collector, which had been divorced since 1774, were to be reunited. The duties of magistrate and judge became mere appendages to that of Collector; the administration of justice became a subordinate function; and in fact all Regulations respecting that administration were passed in the Revenue Department of the Government.

Up to 1790 the criminal judiciary had remained in the hands of the * Sir James Stephen in Nancomor and Impey, ii. p. 221.

† These six were increased in 1781 to eighteen.

native courts. But this was now altered; four Courts of Circuit were created, each to be superintended by two civil servants as judges; the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut at the Presidency being presided over by the Governor-General and the members of Council.

In 1793 the constant succession of revolutions in the judicial system came to something like a pause, with the entire reformation which was enacted by the Regulations of that year. The Collection of Revenue was now entirely separated from the administration of justice; Zillah Courts under European judges were established (Reg. III.) in each of 23 districts and 3 cities, in Bengal, Bahar and Orissa; whilst Provincial Courts of Appeal, each consisting of three judges (Reg. V.), were established at Moorshedabad, Patna, Dacca, and Calcutta. From these courts, under certain conditions, further appeal lay to the Sudder Dewanny Adawluts at the Presidency.

As regarded criminal jurisdiction the judges of the Provincial Courts were also (Reg. IX. 1793) constituted Circuit Courts, liable to review by the Sudder Nizamut. Strange to say, the impracticable idea of placing the duties of both of the higher courts, civil and criminal, on the shoulders of the executive Government was still maintained, and the Governor-General and his Council were the constituted heads of the Sudder Dewanny and Sudder Nizamut. This of course continued as unworkable as it had been; and in Lord Wellesley's time, eight years later, the two Sudder Adawluts were reconstituted, with three regular judges to each, though it was still ruled (Reg. II. 1801) that the chief judge in each court was to be a member of the Supreme Council, not being either the Governor-General, or the Commander-in-Chief. This rule was rescinded by Reg. X. of 1805.

The number of provincial and zillah Courts was augmented in after years with the extension of territory, and additional Sudder Courts, for the service of the Upper Provinces, were established at Allahabad in 1831 (Reg. VI.), a step which may be regarded as the inception of the separation of the N. W. Provinces into a distinct Lieutenant-Governorship, carried out five years later. But no change that can be considered at all organic occurred again in the judiciary system till 1862, for we can hardly consider as such the abolition of the Courts of Circuit in 1829 (Reg. I.), and that of the Provincial Courts of Appeal initiated by a section in Regn. V. of 1831, and completed in 1833.

1822. "This refers to a traditional story which Mr. Elphinstone used to relate. . . . Akalee. s. A member of a body of zealots among the Sikhs, who take this name "from being worshippers of Him who is without time, eternal" (Wilson). Skt. a privative, and kāl 'time.' The Akālīs may be regarded as the Wahābīs of Sikhism. They claim their body to have been instituted by Gurū Govind himself, but this is very doubtful. Cunningham's view of the order is that it was the outcome of the struggle to reconcile warlike activity with the abandonment of the world; the founders of the Sikh doctrine rejecting the inert asceticism of the Hindu sects. The Akālīs threw off all subjection to earthly government, and acted as the censors of the Sikh community in every rank. Runjeet Singh found them very difficult to control. Since the annexation of the Panjab, however, they have ceased to give trouble. The Akali is distinguished by blue clothing and steel armlets. Many of them also used to carry several steel chakras (see Chucker) encircling their turbans.

1832. "We received a message from the Akali who had set fire to the village. . . . These fanatics of the Seik creed acknowledge no superior, and the ruler of the country can only moderate their frenzy by intrigues and bribery. Ala-blaze Pan. This name is given, in the Bombay Presidency, to a tinned-copper stew-pan, having a cover, and staples for straps, which is carried on the march by European soldiers, for the purpose of cooking in, and eating out of. Out on picnics a larger kind is frequently used, and kept continually going, as a kind of pot-au-feu.

Aldea. Additional quotation:

1753. "Les principales de ces qu'on appelle Aldees (terme que les Portugais ont mis en usage dans l'Inde) autour de Pondichéri et dans sa dependance sont . . ."—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, 122.

Alguada, n. p. The name of a reef near the entrance to the Bassein branch of the Irawadi River, on which a splendid lighthouse was erected by Capt. Alex. Fraser (now Lieut.-General Fraser, C.B.) of the Engineers, in 1861-65. See some remarks and quotations under Negrais.

Aljofar. Additional quotation:

1404. "And from these bazars (alcacerias) issue certain gates into certain streets, where they sell many things, such as cloths of silk and cotton, and sendals, and tajetanas, and silk, and pearl (alxofar)."—Clavijo, § lxxx. (comp. Markham, 81).

1508. "The aljofar and pearls that (your Majesty) orders me to send you I cannot have as they have them in Ceylon and in Caille, which are the sources of them: I would buy them with my blood, and with my money, which I have only from your giving. The sinabafis (sinabafos), porcelain vases (porcellanas), and wares of that sort are further off. If for my sins I stay here longer I will endeavour to get everything. The slave-girls that you order me to send you, must be taken from prizes,* for the heathen women of this country are black, and are mistresses to everybody by the time they are ten years old."—Letter of the Viceroy D. Francisco d'Almeida to the King, in Correa, i. 903-9.

Allahabad. Additional quotation:

1753. "Mais ce qui interesse davantage dans la position de Helabas, c'est d'y retrouver celle de l'ancienne Palibothra. Aucune ville de l'Inde ne paroit éгалer Palibothra ou Palimbothra, dans l'Antiquité . . . C'est satisfaire une curiosité géographique bien placée, que de retrouver l'emplacement d'une ville de cette considération: mais j'ai lieu de croire qu'il faut employer

* Query, from captured vessels containing foreign (non-Indian) women? The words are as follows: "As escravas que me diz que the mundo, tomão de prezos, que as Gentias d'esta terra são pretas, e manebas do mundo como chégio a dez annos."

quelque critique, dans l'examen des circonstances que l'Antiquité a fourni sur ce point . . . Je suis donc persuadé, qu'il ne faut point chercher d'autre emplacement à Palibothra que celui de la ville d'Helabas . . ."—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, pp. 58-55.

(Here D'Anville is in error. But see Rennell's Memoir, pp. 50-51, which clearly identifies Palibothra with Patna.

Alleja. Add:

1653. "Alaias (Alajas) est un mot Indien, qui signifie des toiles de coton et de soye; meslée de plusieurs couleurs."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 532.

1885. "The cloth from which these pyjamas are made (in Swät) is known as Alacha, and is as a rule manufactured in their own houses, from 2 to 20 threads of silk being let in with the cotton; the silk as well as the cotton is brought from Peshawur and spun at home."—McNair's Report on Explorations, p. 5.

Aloes. Add:

Neither Hippocrates nor Theophrastus mention aloes, but Dioscorides describes two kinds of it. (Mat. Med. iii. 3.)

"It was probably the Socotrine aloes with which the ancients were most familiar. Bustathius says the aloes was called ispà from its excellence in preserving life (ad Il. 630). This accounts for the powder of aloes being called Hiera pici in the older writers on Pharmacy." (Francis Adams, Names of all Minerals, Plants, and Animals, desc. by the Greek Authors, etc.)

Aloo Bokhara. Add:

c. 1661. "After this their Presents were call'd for, which consisted in some Boxes of choice Laps Lazulus . . . and in many Loads of dry Fruit, as Prunes of Bokara, Aprécocks . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 37.

Alpeen, s. H. alpîn, used in Bombay. A common pin, from Port. alfinete (Panjab N. & Q., ii. 117).

Ambaree. Add:

c. 1665. "On the day that the King went up the Mountain of Pire-ponjale . . . being followed by a long row of elephants, upon which sate the Women in Mikdembers and Embarys . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 130.

1807. "A royal tiger which was started in beating a large cover for game, sprang up so far into the umbarry or state howdah, in which Sujah Dowlah was seated, as to leave little doubt of a fatal issue."—Williamson, Orient. Field Sports, 15.

Amuck. Add:

There is a passage in Correa which shows very clearly the identity between the amoucos of Malabar, and the amuk runners of the Malay islands. In war between the kings of Calicut and Cochin (1503) two princes of Cochin were killed. A number of those desperados who have been spoken of in the quotations were killed;

"But some remained who were not killed, and these went in shame, not to have died avenging their lords . . . these were more than 200, who all according to their custom shaved off all their hair, even to the eyebrows, and embraced each other and their friends and relations, as men about to suffer death. In this case they are as madmen—known as amoucos—and count themselves as already among the dead. These men dispersed, seeking wherever they might find men of Calicut, and among these they rushed fearless, killing and slaying till they were slain. And some of them, about twenty, reckoning more highly of their honour, desired to turn their death to better account; and those separated, and found their way secretly to Calicut, determined to slay the king. But as it became known that they were amoucos, the city gave the alarm, and the King sent his servants to slay them as they slew others. But they like desperate men played the devil (fazão diabruras) before they were slain, and killed many people, with women and children. And five of them got together to a wood near the city, which they haunted for a good while after, making robberies and doing much mischief, until the whole of them were killed."—Correa, i. 364-5.

1879. "Captain Shaw mentioned . . . that he had known as many as 40 people being injured by a single 'amok' runner. When the cry 'amok! amok!' is raised, people fly to the right and left for shelter, for after the blinded madman's kris has once 'drunk blood,' his fury becomes ungovernable, his sole desire is to kill; he strikes here and there; men fall along his course; he stalks fugitives in the back, his kris drips blood, he rushes on yet more wildly, blood and murder in his course; there are shrieks and groans, his bloodshot eyes start from their sockets, his frenzy gives him unnatural strength; then all of a sudden he drops, shot through the heart, or from sudden exhaustion, clutching his bloody kris."—Bird, Golden Chersonese, 356.

Anaconda. Add:

The following passage from St. Jerome, giving an etymology, right or wrong, of the word boa, which our naturalists now limit to certain great serpents of America, but which is often popularly applied to the pythons of Eastern Asia, shows a remarkable analogy to Ray's explanation of the name Anacandaia :

c. A.D. "Si quidem draco mirae magnitudinis, quos gentili sermone Boas vocant, ab eo quod tam grandes sint ut boves glutire soleant, omnem late vastabat provinciam, et non solum armenta et pecudes sed agricolas quoque et pastores tractos ad se vi spiritus absorbebat."—In Vita Scti. Hilariionis Eremitae, Opera Scti. Eus. Hieron. Venetiis, 1767, ii. col. 35.

We can now quote extracts from Cleyer's paper, alluded to in the GLOSS., having found it in the work referred to by Ray, which is, more fully cited, Miscellanea Curiosa, sive Ephemeridum Medico-Physicarum Germanicarum Academiae Naturae Curiosorum, Dec. ii.—Annus Secundus, Anni MDCLXXXIII. Norimbergae. Anno MDCLXXXIV. pp. 18-20.

It is illustrated by a formidable but inaccurate picture shewing the serpent seizing an ox (not a buffalo) by the muzzle, with huge teeth.

He tells how he dissected a great snake that he bought from a huntsman in which he found a whole stag of middle age, entire in skin and every part; and another which contained a wild goat with great horns, likewise quite entire; and a third which had swallowed a porcupine armed with all his "sagittiferis aculeis." In Amboyna a woman great with child had been swallowed by such a serpent. . . .

"Quod si animal quoddam robustius renitatur, ut spiris anguinis enecari non possit, serpens crebris cum animali convolutionibus caudâ suâ proximam arborem in auxilium et robur corporis arripit eamque circumdat, quo eo fortius et valentius gyris suis animal comprimere, suffocare, et demum enecare possit. . . ."

"Factum est hoc modo, ut (quod ex fide dignissimis habeo) in Regno Aracan . . . talis vasti corporis anguis prope flumen quoddam, cum Uro-bubalo, sive sylvestri bubalo aut uro . . . immani spectaculo congredi visus fuerit, eumque dicto modo occiderit; quo confictu et plusquam hostili amplexu fragor ossium in bubalo comminutorum ad distantiam tormenti bellici majoris . . . a spectatoribus sat eminens stantibus exaudiri potuit. . . ."

The natives said these great snakes had poisonous fangs. These Cleyer could not find, but he believes the teeth to be in some degree venomous, for a servant of his scratched his hand on one of them. It swelled, greatly inflamed, and produced fever and delirium :

"Nec prius cessabant symptomata, quam Serpentinus lapis (see Snake-stone) quam Patres Jesuitae hic componunt, vulneri adaptatus omne venenum extraheret, et ubique symptomata convenientibus antidotis essent profligata."

1859. "The skins of anacondas offered at Bangkok come from the northern provinces."—D. O. King, in J. R. G. Soc., xxx. 184.

Andor. Add:

The andor was evidently a kind of muncheel or dandy, i.e., a slung hammock rather than a palankin. But still, as so often is the case, comes in another word to create perplexity. For andas is, in Portuguese, a bier or a litter, appearing in Bluteau as a genuine Portuguese word, and the use of which by the writer of the Roteiro quoted below shows that it is so indeed. And in defining Andor the same lexicographer says: "A portable vehicle in India, in those regions where they do not use beasts, as in Malabar and elsewhere. It is a kind of contrivance like an uncovered Andas, which men bear on their shoulders, &c. . . . Among us, Andor is a machine with four arms in which images or reliques of the saints are borne in processions." This last term is not, as we had imagined, an old Portuguese word. It is Indian, in fact Sanskrit, hindola, 'a swing, a swinging cradle or hammock,' whence also Mahr. hindolâ, and H. handolâ. It occurs, as will be seen, in the old Arabic work about Indian Wonders, published by M.M. Van der Lith and Marcel Devic.

A.D. 1013. "Le même m'a conté qu'à Sérendib, les rois et ceux qui se comportent à la façon des rois, se font porter dans le handoul (handul) qui est semblable à une litère, soutenu sur les épaules de quelques piétons."—Kutâb 'Ajâib-al-Hind, p. 118.

1498. "After two days had passed he (the Catal) came to the factory in an andor which men carried on their shoulders, and these (andors) consist of great canes which are bent overhead and arched, and from these are hung certain cloths of a half fathom wide and a fathom and a half long, and at the ends are pieces of wood to bear the cloth which hangs from the cane; and laid over the cloth there is a great mattress of the same size, and this all made of silk-stuff wrought with gold-thread, and with many decorations and fringes and tassels; whilst the ends of the cane are mounted with silver, all very gorgeous, and rich, like the lords who travel so."—Correa, i. 102.

"Alii trouveram ao capitam mor humas andas d'omeens em que os onrrados, custumam em a quella terra d'andar, e alguns mercadores se as querem ter pagam por ello a elrey certa cousa."—Roteiro, pp. 54-55.

i.e. "There they brought for the Captain-Major certain andas, borne by men, in which the persons of distinction in that country are accustomed to travel, and if any merchants desire to have the same they pay to the King for this a certain amount."

1574. In the quotation of this date under Pundit, the words that I have erroneously rendered 'chairs and palanquins' should be 'andors and palanquins.'

1623. Della Valle describes three kinds of shoulder-borne vehicles in use at Goa: 1. reti or nets, which were evidently the simple hammock, muncheel or dandy; 2. the andor; and 3. the palankin. "And these two, the palankins and the andors, also differ from one another, for in the andor the cane which sustains it is, as it is in the reti, straight; whereas in the palankin, for the greater convenience of the inmate, and to give more room for raising his head, the cane is arched upwards like this, n. For this purpose the canes are bent when they are small and tender. And those vehicles are the most commodious and honourable that have the curved canes, for such canes, of good quality and strength to bear the weight, are not numerous; so they sell for 100 or 120 pardaos each, or about 60 of our scudi."—P. della Valle, ii. 610.

Angely-wood. Add:

c. 1550. "In the most eminent parts of it (Siam) are thick Forests of Angelin wood, whereof thousands of ships might be made."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 285; see also p. 64.

1598. "There are in India other wonderful and thicke trees, whereof Shippes are made: there are trees by Cochin, that are called Angelina, whereof certaine scutes or skiffes called Tones are made . . . it is so strong and hard a woode, that Iron in tract of time would bee consumed thereby, by reason of the hardness of the woode."—Linschoten, ch. 58.

Ant, White. Add:

1679. "But there is yet a far greater inconvenience in this Country, which proceeds from the infinite numbers of white Emmets, which, though they are but little, have teeth so sharp, that they will eat down a wooden Post in a short time. And if great care be not taken in the places where you lock up your Bales of Silk, in four and twenty hours they will eat through a Bale, as if it had been saw'd in two in the middle."—Tavernier's Tunquin, E. T., p. 11.

1751. ". . . concerning the Organ, we sent for the Revd. Mr. Bellamy, who declared that when Mr. Frankland applied to him for it, that he told him that it was not in his power to give it, but wished it was removed from thence, as Mr. Pearson informed him it was eaten up by the White Ants."—Fr. Will. Cons., Aug. 12. In Long, 25.

A friend furnishes the following reminiscence:

"The late Mr. B——, tailor, in Jermyn Street, some 25 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjammass (q.v.) had feet sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: 'I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants.'"

Ap, s. This is in the Bombay Presidency the equivalent of the chupatty (q. v.). But see Hopper in Gloss.

1826. "He sat down beside me, and shared between us his coarse brown aps."—Pandurang Hari.

Apricot. Add:

1738. "The common apricot . . . is . . . known in the Frank language (in Barbary, by the name of Matza Franca, or the Killer of Christians."—Shaw's Travels, ed. 1757, p. 144.

Aracan. Add:

c. 1590. "To the east and south of Bengal is an extensive Kingdom called Arkhang. The Port of Chatgānw belongs to it. This country has many elephants; horses are few and small; camels at a high price; cows and buffaloes there are none, but a piebald animal between the two . . . and the milk of this is used."—Atin (orig.) i. 388.

1660. "Despatches about this time arrived from Mu'azzam Khān, reporting his successive victories and the flight of Shuja to the country of Rakhang, leaving Bengal undefended."—Khutbi Khān, in Elliot, vii. 254.

c. 1665. "Knowing that it is impossible to pass any Cavalry by Land, no, not so much as any Infantry, from Bengale into Rakan, because of the many channels and rivers upon the Frontiers . . . he (the Governor of Bengal) thought upon this experiment, viz., to engage the Hollanders in his design. He therefore sent a kind of Ambassador to Batavia."—Bernier, E. T., 53.

Arbol Triste. Add:

1682. "There (at Malacca) grows a certain tree Zingady, which is called by the Portuguese the Sad Tree, because it closes its flowers at night."—J. Nicuhof, Zee en Lant-Reizen, ii. 57.

Art, European. We have heard much, and justly, of late years, regarding the corruption of Indian art and artistic instinct by the employment of the artists in working for European patrons, and after European patterns. The copying of such patterns is no new thing, as we may see from this passage of the brightest of writers upon India whilst still under Asiatic government.

c. 1665. ". . . not that the Indians have not wit enough to make them successful in Arts, they doing very well (as to some of them) in many parts of India, and it being found that they have inclination enough for them, and that some of them make (even without a Master) very pretty workmanship, and imitate so well our work of Europe, that the difference thereof will hardly be discerned."—Bernier, E. T., 81-82.

Assegay. Add:

1586. "I loro archibugi sono belli, e buoni, come i nostri, e le lance sono fatte con alcune canne piene, e forti, in capo delle quali mettono vn ferro, come uno di quelli delle nostri zagaglie."—Balbi, 111.

Aumildar. Add:

The word in the following passage looks as if intended for amaldār, though there is a term Māldār, 'the holder of property.'

1680. "The Mauldar or Didwan that came with the Ruccas from Golcondah sent forward to Lingappa at Conjiveram."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., 9th Novr. No. III., 38.

Avadavat. Add:

We also find Ahmadābād represented by Madava; as in old maps Astarābād on the Caspian is represented by Strava.

1546. "The greater the resistance they made, the more of their blood was spilt in their defeat, and when they took to flight we gave them chase for the space of half a league. And it is my belief that as far as the will of the officers and lascars went we should not have halted on this side of Madavā; but as I saw that my people were much fatigued, and that the Moors were in great numbers, I withdrew them and brought them back to the city."—D. João de Castro's despatch to the City of Goa respecting the victory at Diu.—Correa, iv. 574.

Aya. Add:

1779. "I was in my own house in the compound, sitting, when the iya came down and told me that her mistress wanted a candle."—"Kinnugur's" evidence, in the case of Grand v. Francis. Ext. in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 225.

B.

Baba. Add:

This word is in general use in Central and Western India as the address to an old man; and is the correct way to address a Gosain.

1826. "I reached the hut of a Gossein . . . and reluctantly tapped at the wicket, calling—"O Baba, O Maharaj."—Pandurang Hari.

Baboo.

1781. "I said . . . From my youth to this day I am a servant to the English. I have never gone to any Rajahs or Bauboos, nor will I go to them."—Depn. of Dooud Sing, Commandant. In Narr. of Insurn. at Banaras in 1781. Calc. 1782. Reprinted at Roorkee, 1853. App., p. 165.

1791.

"Here Edmund was making a monstrous ado, About some bloody Letter, and *Conta Bah-Booh!"

Letters of Simkin the Second, 147.

Badgeer.

1682. At Gamron (Gombroon), "Most of the houses have a square tower which stands up far above the roof, and which in the upper part towards the four winds has ports and openings to admit air and catch the wind, which plays through these, and ventilates the whole house. In the heat of summer people lie at night at the bottom of those towers, so as to get good rest."—Nieu-hof, Zee en Land-Reize, ii. 79.

Bahaudur. Add:

1404. The references to Clavijo may be better entered as to §§ lxxxix and cxli.

1754. "The KIRGESE TARTARS . . . are divided into three HORDAS, under the Government of a KHAN. That part which borders on the RUSSIAN dominions was under the authority of JEAN BEEK, whose name on all occasions was honoured with the title of Bater."—Hanway, i. 239.

This name Jean Beek is probably Janibek, a name which one finds among the hordes as far back as the early part of the 14th century (see Ibn Batuta, ii. 397).

1759. "From Shah Alum Bahadre, son of Alum Guire, the Great Mogul, and successor of the Empire, to Colonel Sabut Jung Bahadre" (i.e. Clive).—Letter in Long, p. 163.

1872. " . . . the word 'Bahādūr' . . . (at the Mogul's Court) . . . was only used as an epithet. Ahmed Shah used it as a title and ordered his name to be read in the Friday prayer as 'Mujahid ud dīn Muhammad Abū naṣr Ahmad Shāh Bahādūr. Hence also 'Kampanī bahadur,' the name by which the E. I. Company is still known in India. The modern 'Khan Bahādūr' is, in Bengal, by permission assumed by Muhammedan Deputy Magistrates, whilst Hindu Deputy Magistrates assume 'Rāi Bahādūr;' it stands, of course, for 'Khān-i-Bahādūr,' 'the courageous Khān.' The compound, however, is a modern abnormal one; for 'Khān' was conferred by the Dīhli Emperors, and so also 'Bahādūr' and 'Bahādūr Khan,' but not 'Khān'

* "Mr. Burke's method of pronouncing it."

Bahādur. —Professor Blochmann, in Ind. Antiquary, i. 261.

Bahirwutteea, s. Guj. bāhirwatā. A species of outlawry in Guzerat; bāhirwatā, the individual practising the offence. It consists in the Rajpoots, or Grassias, making their ryots and dependants quit their native village, which is suffered to remain waste; the Grassia with his brethren then retires to some asylum, whence he may carry on his depredations with impunity. Being well acquainted with the country, and the redress of injuries being common cause with the members of every family, the Bahirwutteea has little to fear from those who are not in the immediate interest of his enemy, and he is in consequence enabled to commit very extensive mischief. —Col. Walker, quoted in Ris Māta, 2d ed. p. 254-5.

Col. Walker derives the name from bāhir, 'out,' and wāt, 'a road.'

The origin of most of the brigandage in Sicily is almost what is here described in Kattiwār.

Basalore. Add:

This name is also applied to an isolated peak, 6762' high, in the Western Ghats, lat. 11° 41' 43". This is an example of Hobson-Jobson, for the proper name is Banasura, and it is known as 'The Buffalo's Hump' (see Imp. Gazetteer, s.v.).

Balass. Refce. to Clavijo should be § cx.

Balcony.

1645-52. "When the King sits to do Justice, I observe that he comes into the Balcone that looks into the Piazza." —Tavernier, E. T., ii. 64.

Bamboo. Add:

With reference to sakkar-mambu, Ritter says: "That this drug (Ta-bashir), as a product of the bamboocane, is to this day known in India by the name of Sucar Mambu is a thing which no one needs to be told" (ix. 334).

But in fact the name seems now entirely unknown.

Banana. Add:

Prof. Robertson Smith points out that the coincidence of this name with the Arabic banān, 'fingers or toes,' and banān, 'a single finger or toe,' can hardly be accidental. The fruit, as we learn from Mukaddasi, grew in Palestine before the Crusades; and that it is known in literature only as mawz would not prove that the fruit was not somewhere popularly known as 'fingers.'

It is possible that the Arabs, through whom probably the fruit found its way to West Africa, may have transmitted with it a name like this; though historical evidence is still to seek.

Bancock. Add:

1611. "They had arrived in the Road of Synn the fiftieth of August, and cast Anchor at three fathoms high water. . . . The Towne lyeth some thirte leagues vp along the Riuer, whither they sent newes of their arrivall. The Sabander (see Shabander) and the Governor of Mancock (a place scituated by the Riuer) came backe with the Messengers to receive his Majesties Letters, but chiefly for the presents expected." —P. Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

Bandaree. Add:

1808. "... whilst on the Brab trees the cast of Bhundarees paid a due for extracting the liquor." —Bombay Regulation I. of 1808, sect. vi., para. 2.

Bandeja. Add:

1747. "Making a small Cott and a rattan Bandijas for the Nabob . . . . (Pagodas) 4 : 32 : 21." —Acct. Expenses at Fort St. David, Jany. MS. Records in India Office.

1766. "To Monurbad Dowla Nabob—

1 Pair Pistols . .	216 0 0
2 China Bandazes.	172 12 9

—Lord Clive's Darbar Charges, in Long, 433.

Bandel. Add:

1753. "... les établissements formés pour assurer leur commerce sont situés sur les bords de cette rivière. Celui des Portugais, qu'ils ont appelé Bandel, en adoptant le terme Persan de Bender, qui signifie port, est aujourd'hui réduit à peu de chose . . . et il est presque contigu à Ugli en remontant." —D'Anville, Éclaircissements, p. 64.

1782. "There are five European factories within the space of 20 miles, on the opposite banks of the river Ganges in Bengal: Houghly, or Bandell, the Portuguese Presidency; Chinsura, the Dutch; Chandernagore, the French; Sirampore, the Danish; and Calcutti, the English." —Price's Observations, &c., p. 51. In P.'s Tracts, i.

Bando ! II. imperative bāndho, 'tie or make fast.' "This, and probably other Indian words have been naturalised in the docks on the Thames frequented by Lascar crews.

"I have seen a London lighter-man, in the Victoria Docks, throw a rope ashore to another Londoner, calling out Bando!" (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

Bantam. Add:

The following evidently, in Pegu, describes Bantams:

1586. "They also eat certain cocks and hens called lorine, which are of the size of a turtle-dove, and have feathered feet; but so pretty, that I never saw so pretty a bird. I brought a cock and hen with me as far as Chaul, and then, suspecting they might be taken from me, I gave them to the Capuchin fathers belonging to the Madre de Dios."—Balbi, f. 125 v, 126.

Banyan. Add:

1665. "In trade these Banians are a thousand times worse than the Jews; more expert in all sorts of cunning tricks, and more maliciously mischievous in their revenge."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 58.

1677. "In their letter to Ft. St. George, 15th March, the Court offer £20 reward 'to any of our servants or soldiers, as shall be able to speak, write, and translate the Banian language, and to learn their arithmetic.'"—In Madras Notes and Exts., No. i., p. 18.

b.—

1775. "We have reason to suspect that the intention was to make him (Nund-comar) Banyan to Gen. Clavering, to surround the General and us with the Governor's creatures, and to keep us totally unacquainted with the real state of the Government."—Minute by Clavering, Monson, and Francis, Ft. William, 11th April. In Price's Tracts, ii. 138.

Bargany, Bragany, H. bārakānī. The name of a small silver coin current in Western India at the time of the Portuguese occupation of Goa, and afterwards valued at 40 reis (then about=5½d.).

The name of the coin was apparently a survival of a very old system of coinage-nomenclature. Kānī is an old Indian word, perhaps Dravidian in origin, but widely spread, indicating  $\frac{1}{4}$  of  $\frac{1}{4}$  of  $\frac{1}{4}$ , or 1-64th part. It was applied to the jital (see Jeetul) or 64th part of the medieval Delhi silver tanka—this latter coin being the prototype in weight and position of the Rupee, as the kānī therefore was of the modern Anglo-Indian pice (=1-64th of a Rupee). There were, in the currency of Moammed Tughlak (1324—1351) of Delhi, aliquot parts of the tanka, Do-kānīs, Shash-kānīs, Hasht-kānīs, Dwāzda-kānīs, and Shānzda-kānīs, representing, as the Persian numerals indicate, pieces of 2, 6, 8, 12, and 16 kānīs or jitals. (See E. Thomas, Pathan Kings of Delhi, pp. 218—219.) Other fractional pieces were added by Firoz Shah, Mahommed's son and successor (see Id. 276 seqq. and quotation under c. 1360, below). Some of these terms long survived, e. g., do-kānī in localities of Western and Southern India, and in Western India in the present case the bārakānī or 12 kānī, a vernacular form of the dwāzda-kānī of Mahommed Tughlak.

1380. "Thousands of men from various quarters, who possessed thousands of these copper coins . . . now brought them to the treasury, and received in exchange gold tankas and silver tankas, shash-gānīs and dū-gānīs, which they carried to their homes."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 240-241.

c. 1350. "Sultan Fīroz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka and the silver tanka. There were also distinct coins of the respective value of 48, 25, 24, 12, 10, 8, and 6, and one jital, known as chihāl-o-hasht-gānī, bist-o-panjgānī, bist-o-chahār-gānī, dwāzdah-gānī, dahgānī, hasht-gānī, shashgānī, and yak jital."—Id. 357-358.

1510. See barganym, in quotation from Correa, under pardao in SUPPL.

1554. "E as tangas brancas que se recebem dos foros, são de 4 barganis a tanga, e de 24 leaes o bargany . . ." i.e. "And the white tungas that are received in payment of land revenues are at the rate of 4 barganis to the tanga, and of 24 leals to the bargany."—A. Nunes, in Subsidios, p. 31.

"Statement of the Revenues which the King our Lord holds in the Island and City of Guoa"

"Item—The Islands of Ticoary, and Divar, and that of Chorão, and Johão, all of them, pay in land revenue (de foro) according to ancient custom 36,474 white tanguas, 3 barguanis, and 21 leals, at the tale of 3 barguanis to the tangua and 24 leals to the barguanim, the same thing as 24 bazarucos, amounting to 14006 pardaos, 1 tangua and 47 leals, making 4,201,916½ reis. The Isle of Ticoary (see s.v. Salsette, p. 754, col. b) is the largest, and on it stands the city of Guoa; the others are much smaller and are annexed to it, they being all contiguous, only separated by rivers."—Botelho, Tombo, ibid., pp. 46-47.

1584. "They vse also in Goa amongst the common sort to bargain for coals, wood, lime, and such like, at so many braganines, accounting 24 basaruchies for one bragaine, albeit there is no such money stamped."—Barret in Hakluyt, ii. 411 (but it is copied from G. Balbi's Italian, f. 71r.)

Barramuhul, n. p. II. Lāra-mahall, 'Twelve Estates;' an old designation of a large part of what is now the district of Salem, in the Madras Presidency.

1881. "The Baramahal and Dindigal was placed under the Government of Madras; but owing to the deficiency in that Presidency of civil servants possessing a competent knowledge of the native languages, and to the unsatisfactory manner in which the revenue administration of the older possessions of the Company under the Madras Presidency had been conducted, Lord Cornwallis resolved to employ military officers for a time in the management of the Baramahl."—Arbuthnot, Mem. of Sir T. Munro, xxxviii.

Bashaw. Add:

"Great kings of Barbary and my portly bassas."

Marlowe, Tamburlane the Great, 1st Part, iii. 1.

c. 1500. "Filius alter Osmanis, Vrchanis frater, alium non habet in Annalibus titulum, quam Alis bassa: quod bassae vocabulum Turcis caput significat."—Lennelavivus, Annales Sultanorum Ottomanidarum, ed. 1650, p. 402.

This etymology connecting bāshā with the Turkish bāsh, 'head,' must be rejected.

Bassan, s. H. bāsan, 'a dinner-plate;' from Port. bacia (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 117).

Bassadore. Add:

The permission for the English to occupy Basidū as a naval station was granted by Saiyyid Sultan bin Alḥmad of 'Omān, about the end of last century; but it was not actually occupied by us till 1821, from which time it was the depot of our Naval Squadron in the Gulf till 1882.

Batāra, s. This is a term applied to divinities in old Javanese inscriptions, etc., the use of which was spread over the Archipelago. It was regarded by W. von Humboldt as taken from the Skt. avatāra (see Avatar); but this derivation is now rejected. The word is used among R. C. Christians in the Philippines now as synonymous with 'God;' and is applied to the infant Jesus (Blumentritt, Vocabular).

Batta. Add:

Further reading has entirely confirmed as the true origin of the Anglo-Indian batta, the suggestion s. v. that the word (and, I may add, the thing) originated in Portuguese practice, and in the use of the Canarese word blatta, Mahr. blāt, 'rice' in 'the husk,' called by the Portuguese bate and bata, for a maintenance allowance.

The word batty, for what is more generally called paddy, is or was commonly used by the English also in S. and W. India (see Linschoten, Lucena, and Pryer quoted s. v. Paddy, and Wilson's Glossary s. v. Bhatta).

The practice of giving a special allowance for mantimento began from a very early date in the Indian history of the Portuguese, and it evidently became a recognized augmentation of pay, corresponding closely to our batta, whilst the quotation from Botelho s. v. batta in the Glossary shows also that bata and mantimento were used, more or less interchangeably, for this allowance. The correspondence with our Anglo-Indian batta went very far. The discontent raised in the Indian Army by the reduction of full-batta to half-batta under Lord William Bentinck's government is alluded to in the Glossary, and a case singularly parallel is spoken of by Correa (iv. 256). The mantimento had been paid all the year round, but the Governor, Martin Afonso de Sousa, in 1542, "desiring," says the historian, "a way to curry favour for himself, whilst going against the people and sending his soul to hell," ordered that in future the mantimento should be paid only during the 6 months of winter (i.e., of the rainy season), when the force was on shore, and not for the other 6 months when they were on board the cruisers, and received rations. This created great bitterness, perfectly analogous in depth and in expression to that entertained with regard to Lord W. Bentinck and Sir John Malcolm, in 1829. Correa's utterance, just quoted, illustrates this, and a little lower down he adds: "And thus he took away from the troops the half of their mantimento (half their batta, in fact), and whether he did well or ill in that, he'll find in the next world." (See also id. p. 430.)

The following quotations illustrate the Portuguese practice from an early date:

1502. "The Captain-major . . . between officers and men-at-arms, left 60 men (at Cochin), to whom the factor was to give their pay, and every month a cruzado of mantimento, and to the officers when on service 2 crúzados . . .—Correa, i. 328.

1507. (In establishing the settlement at Mozambique). "And the Captains took counsel among themselves, and, from the money in the chest, paid the force each a crúzado a month for mantimento, with which the men greatly refreshed themselves . . ."—Id. 786.

1511. "All the people who served in Malaca, whether by sea or by land, were paid their pay for six months in advance, and also received monthly two crúzados of mantimento, cash in hand" (i.e. they had double batta).—Id. ii. 267.

1554. An example of batee for rice will be found s.v. Moorah, in Gloss.

The following quotation shows battie (or batty) used at Madras in a way that also indicates the original identity of batty, 'rice,' and batta, 'extra allowance':

1680. "The Peons and Tarryars (see Taliyar) sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted from the garrison returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereupon the peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again, and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for Battie . . ."—Ft. St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 10. In Notes and Exts. No. III. p. 3.

The following quotations illustrate sense b, quite a different word:

1680. "The payment or receipt of Batta or Vatum upon the exchange of Pollicat for Madras Pagodas prohibited, both coins being of one and the same Matt and weight, upon pain of forfeiture of 24 pagodas for every offence together with the loss of the Batta."—Ibid. p. 17.

1760. "The Nabob receives his revenues in the siccas of the current year only . . . and all siccas of a lower date being esteemed, like the coin of foreign provinces, only a merchandize, are bought and sold at a certain discount called batta, which rises and falls like the price of other goods in the market . . ."—Ft. Wm. Consn., June 30, in Long, 216.

Battas, Bataks, n. p. Add:

1586. "Nel regno del Dacin sono alcuni luoghi, ne' quali si ritrovano certe genti, che mangiano le creature humane, e tali genti si chiamano Bataochi, e quando frà loro i padri, e i madri sono vecchi, si accordano i viciniati di mangiarli, e li mangiano."—G. Balbi, f. 130.

Bay. Add:

1747. "We have therefore laden on her 1784 Bales . . . which we sincerely wish may arrive safe with You, as We do that the Gentlemen at the Bay had according to our repeated Requests, furnished us with an earlier conveyance . . ."—Letter from Ft. St. David, 2d May, to the Court (MS. in India Office).

Bayadère. Add:

1513. "There also came to the ground many dancing women (molheres bailadeiras) with their instruments of music, who make their living by that business, and these danced and sang all the time of the banquet . . ."—Correa, ii. 364.

c. 1836. "On one occasion a rumour reached London that a great success had been achieved in Paris by the performance of a set of Hindoo dancers, called Les Bayadères, who were supposed to be priestesses of a certain sect, and the London theatrical managers were at once on the qui vive to secure the new attraction . . . My father had concluded the arrangement with the Bayadères before his brother managers arrived in Paris. Shortly afterwards, the Hindoo priestesses appeared at the Adelphi. They were utterly uninteresting, wholly unattractive. My father lost £2000 by the speculation; and in the family they were known as the 'Buy-em-dears' ever after."—Edmund Yates, Recollections, i. 29-30 (1884).

Bayparree, Beoparry, s. H. be-pūri, and byopūri (from Skt. vyāpārīn); a trader, and especially a petty trader or dealer.

A friend, long engaged in business in Calcutta, * communicates a letter from an intelligent Bengalee gentleman illustrating the course of trade in country produce before it reaches the hands of the European shipper:

1878. ". . . The enhanced rates . . . do not practically benefit the producer in a marked, or even in a corresponding degree; for the lion's share goes into the pockets of certain intermediate classes, who are the growth of the above system of business.

"Following the course of trade as it flows into Calcutta, we find that between the cultivators and the exporter these are: 1st. The Bepparree, or petty trader; 2nd. The Aurut-dar;† and 3rd. The Mahajun, interested in the Calcutta trade. As soon as the crops are cut, Bepparree appears upon the scene; he visits village after village, and goes from homestead to homestead, buying there, or at the village marts, from the ryots; he then takes his purchases to the Aurut-dar, who is stationed at a centre of trade, and to whom he is perhaps under advances, and from the Aurut-dar the Calcutta Mahajun obtains his supplies . . . for eventual despatch to the capital. There is also a fourth class of dealers called Phoreas, who buy from the Mahajun and sell to the European exporter. Thus, between the cultivator and the shipper there are so many middlemen, whose participation in the trade involves a multiplication of profits, which goes a great way towards enhancing the price of commodities before they reach the shipper's hands."—Letter from Baboo Nobokissin Ghose.

* Mr. J. F. Ogilvy, of Gillanders & Co.

† Aurut-dar is ārhat-dar, from H. ārhat, 'agency'; phorea = H. phariya, 'a retailer.'

Bdellium. Add:

Dr. Royle says the Persian authors describe the bdellium as being the product of the Doom palm (see Hindu Medicine, p. 90). But this we imagine is due to some ambiguity in the sense of mokh.

Bear-tree. Add:

The word is commonly called bor in the Central Provinces. (M.-G. Keatinge.)

Bearer. Add:

1771. "Le bout le plus court du Palanquin est en devant, et porté par deux Beras, que l'on nomme Boys à la Côte (c'est-à-dire Garçons, Serviteurs, en Anglois). Le long bout est par derrière et porté par trois Beras."—Anquetil du Perron, Desc. Prelim. p. xxiii. Note.

Begum. Add:

1619. "Behind the girl came another Begum, also an old woman, but lean and feeble, holding on to life with her teeth, as one might say."—P. della Valle, ii. 6.

Beer. Add:

1638. "... The Captain ... was well provided with ... excellent good Sack, English Beer, French Wines, Arak, and other refreshments."—Mandelslo, E. T., p. 10.

Beer, Country. Add:

1782. "It brings to mind a story of old Governor Boucher, of Bombay. The old gentleman was very fond of a composition of weak liquor much used by Europeans in Asia, called Country beer. A European Captain of one of the Company's ships ... asked the Governor why he drank so much of that slow poison, country beer. 'Very slow indeed,' replies the old man; 'I have used it these 50 years, and here I am yet.'—Price, Letter to E. Burke, p. 33, in Tracts, ii.

Behar, n. p. H. Bahār. That province of the Mogul Empire, which lay on the Ganges immediately above Bengal, was so called, and still retains the name and the character of a province, under the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, and embracing the ten modern districts of Patna, Sāran, Gāya, Shāhābād, Tirhut, Champāran, the Santāl Parganas, Bhāgalpūr, Monghyr, and Purniah. The name was taken from the old city of Bihār, and that derived its title from being the site of a famous Vihara (q.v.) in Buddhist times. In the later days of Mahommedan rule the three provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa were under one Subadar, viz. the Nawab who resided latterly at Murshidābād.

The following is the first example we have noted of the occurrence of the three famous names in combination:

1679. "On perusal of several letters relating to the procuring of the Great Mogul's Phyrmaund for trade, custome free, in the Bay of Bengall, the Chief in Council at Hugly is ordered to procure the same, for the English to be Customs free in Bengal, Oriza and Bearra . . ."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons., 20th Feb. in Notes and Exts., Pt. ii. p. 7.

Benares, n. p. The famous and holy city on the Ganges. II. Benāras from Skt. Vārāṇasī. The popular Pundit etymology is from the names of the streams Varaṇā (mod. Barnā) and Asī, the former a river of some size on the north and east of the city, the latter a rivulet now embraced within its aren. This origin is very questionable. The name, as that of a city, has been (according to Mr. F. Hall) familiar to Sanskrit literature since n.c. 120. The Buddhist legends would carry it much further back, the name being in them very familiar.

c. 637. "The Kingdom of P'o-lo-ni-se (Vārāṇasī Bénarés) is 4000 li in compass. On the west the capital adjoins the Ganges, etc."—Hsiouen Tshang, in Fél. Boudd. ii. 354.

c. 1020. "If you go from Bīrf on the banks of the Ganges, in an easterly direction, you come to Ajodh, at the distance of 25 parasangs; thence to the great Benares (Bānāras) about 20."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, i. 56.

1605. "Banarou is a large City, and handsomely built; the most part of the Houses being either of Brick or Stone . . . but the inconvenience is that the Streets are very narrow."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 52.

Beriberi. Add:

1682. "The Indian and Portuguese women draw from the green flowers and cloves, by means of firing with a still, a water or spirit of marvellous sweet smell . . . especially is it good against a certain kind of paralysis called Berebery."—Nieuw-hof, Zee en Land-Reize, ii. 33.

1882. "Berbá, a disease which consists in great swelling of the abdomen."—Blumentritt, Vocabular, s.v.

1885. "Dr. Wallace Taylor, of Osaka, Japan, reports important discoveries respecting the origin of the disease known as beri-beri. He has traced it to a microscopic spore found largely developed in rice. He has finally detected the same organism in the earth of certain alluvial and damp localities."—St. James's Gazette, Aug. 9th.

Betel. Add:

1677. The Court of the E. I. Co. in a letter to Ft. St. George, Dec. 12, disapprove of allowing "Valentine Nurse 20 Rupees a month for diet, 7 Rs. for house-rent, 2 for a cook, 1 for Beetle, and 2 for a Porter, which is a most extravagant rate, which we shall not allow either him or any other."—Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 21.

Bezoar. Add:

c. 1580. . . . "adeo ut ex solis Bezahar nonnulla vasa conflata viderim, maxime apud eos qui a venenis sibi cavere student."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. p. 56.

Bheesty. Add:

1782. (Table of Wages in Calcutta), Consummah . . . . 10 Rs.
 Kistmutdar . . . . 6 "
 Beasty . . . . 5 "

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

Five Rupees continued to be the standard wage of a bihishtti for full 80 years after the date given.

Bilayutee pawnee. Add:

1885. "But look at us English, I urged, 'we are ordered thousands of miles away from home, and we go without a murmur.' 'It is true, Khudavundi,' said Gunga Pursad, 'but you sahibs drink English-water (soda-water) and the strength of it enables you to bear up under all fatigues and sorrows.' His idea (adds Mr. Knighton) was that the effervescing force of the soda-water, and the strength of it which drove out the cork so violently, gave strength to the drinker of it."—Times of India Mail, Aug. 11, 1885.

Bilooch. Add:

1648. "Among the Machumatists next to the Pattans are the Blotias of great strength."—Van Twist, 58.

Biscobra, s. H. biskhoprā or biskhapa.

The name popularly applied to a large lizard alleged, and commonly believed, to be mortally venomous. It is very doubtful whether there is any real lizard to which this name applies, and it may be taken as certain that there is none in India with the qualities attributed. It is probable that the name does carry to many the terrific character which the ingenious author of Tribes on My Frontier alleges. But the name has nothing to do with either bis in the sense of 'twice,' or cobra in that of 'snake.' The first element is no doubt bish (q.v.), poison, and the second is probably khoprā, a shell or skull.

1883. "But of all the things on earth that bite or sting, the palm belongs to the biscobra, a creature whose very name seems to indicate that it is twice as bad as the cobra. Though known by the terror of its name to natives and Europeans alike, it has never been described in the Proceedings of any learned Society, nor has it yet received a scientific name. . . . The awful deadliness of its bite admits of no question, being supported by countless authentic instances. . . . The points on which evidence is required are—first, whether there is any such animal; second, whether, if it does exist, it is a snake with legs, or a lizard without them."—Tribes on My Frontier, p. 205.

Black (p. 73, col. b). Add before first quotation, p. 74, col. a:

1676. "We do not approve of your sending any persons to St. Helena against their wills. One of them you sent there makes a great complaint, and we have ordered his liberty to return again if he desires it; for we know not what effect it may have if complaints should be made to the King that we send away the natives; besides that it is against our inclination to buy any blacks, and to transport them from their wives and children without their own consent."—Court's Letter to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Exts. No. 1. p. 12.

1747. "Vencatachlam, the Commanding Officer of the Black Military, having behaved very commendably on several occasions against the French; In consideration thereof Agreed that a Present be made him of Six hundred Rupees to buy a Horse, that it may encourage him to act in like manner."—Ft. St. David Cons., Feb. 6 (MS. Record, in India Office).

1750. "Having received information that some Blacks residing in this town were dealing with the French for goods proper for the Europe market, we told them if we found any proof against any residing under your Honors' protection, that such should suffer our utmost displeasure."—Ft. Wm. Cons., Feb. 4, in Long, 24.

1753. "John Wood, a free merchant, applies for a pass which, if refused him, he says 'it will reduce a free merchant to the condition of a foreigner, or indeed of the meanest black fellow.'"—Ft. Wm. Cons., in Long, p. 41.

1761. "You will also receive several private letters from Hastings and Sykes, which must convince me as Circumstances did me at the time, that the Dutch forces were not sent with a View only of defending their own Settlements, but absolutely with a Design of disputing our Influence and Possessions; certain Ruin must have been the Consequence to the East India Company. They were raising black Forces at Patna, Cossimbazar, Chinsura, &c. and were working Night and day to compleat a Field Artillery . . . all these preparations previous to the commencement of Hostilities plainly prove the Dutch meant to act offensively not defensively."—Holograph Letter from Olive (unpublished) in the India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed "27th Decr. 1761."

1762. "The Black inhabitants send in a petition setting forth the great hardship they labour under in being required to sit as arbitrators in the Court of Cutcherry."—Ft. Willm. Cons., in Long, 277.

1782. See quotation under Sepoy, from Price.

In the following the meaning is special :

1788. "For Sale. That small upper-roomed Garden House, with about 5 big-gahs (see beegah) of ground, on the road leading from Cheringhee to the Burying Ground, which formerly belonged to the Moravians; it is very private, from the number of trees on the ground, and having lately received considerable additions and repairs, is well adapted for a Black Family. Apply to Mr. Camac."—In Seton-Karr, i. 282.

Black Town.

1782. "When Mr. Hastings came to the government he added some new regulations . . . divided the black and white town (Calcutta) into 35 wards, and purchased the consent of the natives to go a little further off."—Price, Some Observations, etc., p. 60. In Tracts, vol. i.

1827. "Hartley hastened from the Black Town, more satisfied than before that some deceit was about to be practised towards Menie Gray."—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xi.

Bobbery-bob! Add:

1782. "Captain Cowe being again examined . . . if he had any opportunity to make any observations concerning the execution of Nundcomar? said, he had; that he saw the whole except the immediate act of execution . . . there were 8 or 10,000 people assembled; who at the moment the Rajah was turned off, dispersed suddenly, crying 'Ah-bauparee!' leaving nobody about the gallows but the Sheriff and his attendants, and a few European spectators. He explains the term Ah-baup-aree, to be an exclamation of the black people, upon the appearance of anything very alarming, and when they are in great pain."—Price's 2nd Letter to E. Burke, p. 5. In Tracts, vol. ii.

From Report of Select Committee of H. of C. :

"If an Hindoo was to see a house on fire, to receive a smart slap on the face, break a china basin, cut his finger, see two Europeans boxing, or a sparrow shot, he would call out Ah-baup-aree!"—Ibid. pp. 9-10.

1863-64. "My men soon became aware of the unwelcome visitor, and raised the cry, 'A bear, a bear!'"

"Ahi! bap-re-bap! Oh, my father! go and drive him away," said a timorous voice from under a blanket close by."—Lt. Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 142.

Bombay. Add:

1508. "The Viceroy quitted Dabul, passing by Chaul, where he did not care to go in, to avoid delay, and anchored at Bombaim, whence the people fled when they saw the fleet, and our men carried off many cows, and caught some blacks whom they found hiding in the woods, and of these they took away those that were good, and killed the rest."—Correa, i. 926.

1531. "The Governor at the island of Bombaim awaited the junction of the whole expedition, of which he made a muster, taking a roll from each captain, of the Portuguese soldiers and sailors and of the captive slaves who could fight and help, and of the number of musketeers, and of other people, such as servants. And all taken together he found in the whole fleet some 3500 soldiers (homens d'armas), counting captains and gentlemen; and some 1450 Portuguese seamen, with the pilots and masters; and some 2000 soldiers who were Malabars and Goa Canarines; and 8000 slaves fit to fight; and among these he found more than 3000 musketeers (espungardeiros), and 4000 country seamen who could row (marinheiros de terra remeiros), besides the mariners of the junks who were more than 800; and with married and single women, and people taking goods and provisions to sell, and menial servants, the whole together were more than 30,000 souls. . . ."—Correa, iii. 392.

Bora. Add:

c. 1780. "Among the rest was the whole of the property of a certain Muhamamad Moksim, a man of the Bohra tribe, the Chief of all the merchants, and the owner of three or four merchant ships."—H. of Hytbur Naik, 383.

Borneo. Add:

1521. "The two ships departed thence, and running among many islands came on one which contained much cinnamon of the finest kind. And then again running among many islands they came to the Island of Borneo, where in the harbour they found many junks belonging to merchants from all the parts about Malacca, who make a great mart in that Borneo.”—Correa, ii. 631.

Boutique. Add:

1767. “Mr. Russell, as Collector General, begs leave to represent to the Board that of late years the Street by the river side . . . has been greatly encroached upon by a number of golahs, little straw huts, and boutiques . . .”—In Long, 501.

Bowly. Add:

An example of the form wāin occurs in Baber's Memoirs:

1526. “There was an empty space within the fort (of Agra) between Ibrahim's palace and the ramparts. I directed a large wāin to be constructed on it, ten gez by ten. In the language of Hindostān they denominate a large well having a staircase down it wāin.”—Baber, 342.

Brahminy Butter. This seems to have been an old name for ghee (q.v.). In MS. “Acct. Charges, Dieting, etc., at Fort St. David for Nov.—Jany., 1746–47.” in India Office, we find:

“Butter . . . . Pagodas 2 2 0
Brahminy do. „ 1 34 0.”

Brandy (Coortee). Add:

1754. “Their women also being not less than 6000, were dressed with great coats (these are called baramni) of crimson cloth, after the manner of the men, and not to be distinguished at a distance; so that the whole made a very formidable appearance.”—H. of Nadir Shah, in Hamway, 367.

Breech-Candy, n. p. A locality on the shore of Bombay Island to the north of Malabar Hill. The true name, as Dr. Murray Mitchell tells me, is believed to be Burj-khādī, ‘the Tower of the Creek.’

Broach. Add:

1648. In Van Twist, p. 11, it is written Broichia.

Bucksheesh. Add:

1759. “To Presents:— R. A. P.
2 Pieces of flowered Velvet 532 7 0
1 ditto of Broad Cloth . . 50 0 0
Buxis to the Servants . . 50 0 0”

Cost of Entertainment to Juggat Set. In Long, 190.

Buddha, Buddhist. Add:

It is remarkable how many poems on the subject of Buddha have appeared of late years. We have noted:

1. Buddha, Epische Dichtung in Zwanzig Gesängen, i.e. an Epic Poem in 20 cantos (In ottava rima). Von Joseph Vittor Widmann, Bern, 1869.

2. The Story of Gautama Buddha and his Creed: An Epic by Richard Phillips, Longmans, 1871. This is also printed in octaves, but each octave consists of 4 heroic couplets.

3. Vasavadatta, a Buddhist Idyll; by Dean Plumtre. Republished in Things New and Old, 1884. The subject is the story of the Courtesan of Mathura (“Vāsavadattā and Upagupta”), which is given in Burnouf's Introd. à l'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, 146–148; a touching story, even in its original crude form.

It opens:

The Sansk. Dict. gives indeed an alternative Mathūra, but Mathūra is the usual name, whence Anglo-Ind. Muttra.

4. The brilliant Poem of Mr. Edwin Arnold, called The Light of Asia, or The Great Renunciation, being the Life and Teaching of Gautama, Prince of India, and Founder of Buddhism as told in verse by an Indian Buddhist, 1879.

c. 1190. “Very grieved was Śārang Deva. Constantly he performed the worship of the Arihant; the Buddhist religion he adopted; he wore no sword.”—The Poem of Chand Bardai, paraphr. by Beames, in Indian Antiquary, i. 271.

1753. “Edrisi nous instruit de cette circonstance, en disant que le Balahar est adorateur de Bodda. Les Brahmenes du Malabar disent que c'est le nom que Vishtnu a pris dans une de ses apparitions, et on connoît Vishtnu pour une des trois principales divinités Indiennes. Suivant St. Jérôme et St. Clément d'Alexandrie, Budda ou Butta est le législateur des Gymno-Sophistes de l'Inde. La secte des Shamans ou Samanéens, qui est demeurée la dominante dans tous les royaumes d'au delà du Gange, a fait de Budda en cette qualité son objet d'adoration. C'est la première des divinités Chingulaises ou de Ceilan, selon Ribeiro. Samano-Codom (see in Gloss. under Gautama), la grande idole des Siamois, est par eux appelé Putti.”—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, 75.

What knowledge and apprehension, on a subject then so obscure, is shown by this great Geographer! Compare the pretentious ignorance of the flashy Abbé Raynal in the quotations in Gloss. under 1770.

Budge-Budge, n. p. A village on the Hoogly R., 15 m. below Calcutta, where stood a fort which was captured by Clive when advancing on Calcutta to recapture it, in December, 1756. The 'Imperial Gazetteer' gives the true name as Buj-baj.

1756. "On the 29th December, at six o'clock in the morning, the admiral having landed the Company's troops the evening before at Mayapour, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive, cannonaded Bougee Bougee Fort, which was strong and built of mud, and had a wet ditch round it."—Ives, 99.

1757. The Author of Memoir of the Revolution in Bengal calls it Busbudgia; (1763), Luke Sraffton Budge Boodjee.

Budgrook.

The following quotation may possibly contain some indication of the true form of this obscure word, but I have derived no light from it myself.

1838. "Only eight or ten loads (of coffee) were imported this year, including two loads of 'Kopes' (copecks), the copper currency of Russia, known in this country by the name of Bughruckcha. They are converted to the same uses as copper."—Report from Kabul, by A. Burnes; in Punjab Trade Report, App. p. iii.

Budlee, s. A substitute in public or domestic service. H. badli, 'exchange; a person taken in exchange; a locum tenens;' from Ar. badal, 'he changed.'

Buggy. Add:

"When the Hunterian spelling-controversy raged in India, a learned Member of Council is said to have stated that he approved the change until _____ began to spell buggy as bagi. Then he gave it up!" (M.-G. Keatinge).

I have recently seen this spelling in print.

Bungalow. Add:

The following examples carry back this word 60 to 80 years earlier than any from actual European use that we had previously found. The spelling in that of 1747 tends to confirm the etym. from Bengal.

c. 1680. In the tracing of an old Dutch chart in the India Office, which may be assigned to about this date, as it has no indication of Calcutta, we find at Hoogly: "Ougli . . . Hollantse Logie . . . Bangelaer of Speedhuys," i.e. "Hoogly . . . Dutch Factory . . . Bungalow, or Pleasure-house."

1711. "Mr. Herring, the Pilot's, Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hughley."

"From Gull Gat all along the Hughley Shore until below the New Chaney almost as far as the Dutch Bungalow lies a Sand. . . ."—Thornton, The English Pilot, Pt. III., p. 54.

1711. "Natty Bungelo or Nedds Bangalla River lies in this Reach (Tanna) on the Larboard side. . . ."—Id., 56.

The place in the chart is Nedds Bangalla, and seems to have been near the present Akra on the Hoogly.

1747. "Nabob's Camp near the Hedge of the Bounds, building a Bangallaa, raising Mudd Walls round the Camp, making Gun Carriages, &c. . . . (Pagodas) 55 : 18 : 73."—Acct. of Extraordinary Charges . . . January, at Fort St. David, M.S. Records in India Office.

Burgher. Add:

c. Also 'a rafter,' H. bagā.

Burma. Add:

1543. "And folk coming to know of the secrecy with which the force was being despatched, a great desire took possession of all to know whither the Governor intended to send so large an armament, there being no Rumis to go after, and nothing being known of any other cause why ships should be despatched in secret at such a time. So some gentlemen spoke of it to the Governor, and much importuned him to tell them whither they were going, and the Governor, all the more bent on concealment of his intentions, told them that the expedition was going to Pegu to fight with the Bramas who had taken that Kingdom."—Correa, iv. 298.

1680. "ARTICLES of COMMERCE to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu, in behalfe of the English Nation for the settling of a Trade in those countrys."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons. In Notes and Exts., iii. 7.

Burrampooter. Add:

1753. "Un peu au-dessous de Daka, le Gange est joint par une grosse rivière, qui sort de la frontière du Tibet. Le nom de Bramanpoutre qu'on lui trouve dans quelques cartes est une corruption de celui de Brahmaputren, qui dans le langage du pays signifie tirant son origine de Brahma."—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, 62.

Bussora, Balsora, etc. n. p. The sea-port city of Dasra at the mouth of the Shat-al-'Arab, or United Euphrates and Tigris.

c. 1580. "Balsara, altrimente detta Bassora, è una città posta nell' Arabia, la quale al presente è signoreggiata dal Turco . . . è città di gran negozio di spetiarie, di droghe, e altre merci che uengono di Ormus; è abbondante di dattoli, risi, e grani."—Balbi, f. 32 f.

1671.

"From Atropatia and the neighbouring plains
Of Adiabene, Media, and the south Of Susiana to Balsara's Haven. . . ."
Paradise Regained, iii.

1747. "He (the Prest. of Bombay) further advises us that they have wrote our Honble Masters of the Loss of Madrass by way of Bussero, the 7th of November."—Ft. St. David Consn., 8th Jany. 1746-47. MS. in India Office.

See also quotations under Congo in SUPPT.

Buxee. Add:

c. 1340. "The Kings of this country sprung from Jinghiz Khan . . . followed exactly the yassah (or laws) of that prince, and the dogmas received in his family, which consisted in revering the sun, and conforming in all things to the advice of the Bakhshis."—Shihābuddin, in Not. et Extr. xiii. 237.

1766. "The Buxey lays before the Board an account of charges incurred in the Buxey Connah . . . for the relief of people saved from the Falmouth."—Ft. William, Consn., in Long, 457.

1827. "Doubt it not—the soldiers of the Beegum Mooteah Mahul . . . are less hers than mine. I am myself the Bukshee . . . and her Sirdars are at my devotion."—Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xii.

Buxerry. Add:

We have not found this term excepting in documents pertaining to the middle decades of last century in Bengal; nor have we found any satisfactory etymology. As an additional conjecture, however, we may suggest Baksārīs, from the possible circumstance that such men were recruited in the country about Baksār (Bucar), i.e., the Shahābād district, which up to 1857 was a great recruiting ground for sepoys.

1748. "Ordered the Zemindars to send Buxerries to clear the boats and bring them up as Prisoners."—Ft. William Consn., April, in Long, p. 6.

1749. "Having frequent reports of several straggling parties of this banditti plundering about this place, we on the 2d November, ordered the Zemindars to entertain one hundred buxeries and fifty pikemen over and above what were then in pay for the protection of the outskirts of your Honor's town."—Letter to Court, Jany. 13. Ibid. p. 21.

1755. In the extract from Long under this date, for Buxerries read Buxaries.

"In an account for this year we find among charges on behalf of William Wallis, Esq., Chief at Cossimbazar:

Rs.
"4 Buxeries . . . 20 (year) . 240"
MS. Records in India Office.

1772. "Buckserrias. Foot soldiers whose common arms are only sword and target."—Glossary in Grose's Voyage, 2nd ed.

Byde or Bede Horse. Add:

The Bedar are mentioned as one of the predatory classes of the Peninsula, along with Marawars, Kallars, Ramusis, etc., in Sir Walter Elliot's paper, J. Ethnol. Soc. 1869, N. S., pp. 112-113.

But more will be found regarding them in a paper by the late General Briggs, the translator of Firishta's History in the J. R. As. Soc. xiii.

Besides Bedar, Bednor (or Nagar) in Mysore seems to take its name from this tribe.

C.*Cabob. Add:

c. 1580. "Altero modo . . . ipsam (carnem) in parva frusta dissectam, et veruculis ferreis acuum modo infixam, super crates ferreas igne supposito positam torrefaciunt, quam succo limonum aspersam avidè esitant."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i. 229.

Cabook. Add:

1834. "The soil varies in different situations on the Island. In the country round Colombo it consists of a strong red clay, or marl, called Cabook, mixed with sandy ferruginous particles."—Ceylon Gazetteer, 33.

Cacouli. Add:

1759. "These Vakeels . . . stated that the Rani (of Bednore) would pay a yearly sum of 100,000 Hoons or Pagodas, besides a tribute of other valuable articles, such as Foful (betel), Dates, Sandal wood, Kakul . . . black pepper, &c."—Hist. of Hydr. Naik, 133.

Cadjowa, s. A kind of frame or pannier, of which a pair are slung across a camel, sometimes made like litters to carry women or sick persons, sometimes to contain sundries of camp equipage.

1645. "He entered the town with 8 or 10 camels, the two Cajavas or Litters on each side of the Camel being close shut . . . But instead of Women, he had put into every Cajava two Souldiers."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 61.

1790. "The camel appropriated to the accommodation of passengers, carries two persons, who are lodged in a kind of pannier, laid loosely on the back of the animal. This pannier, termed in the Persic Kidjahwah, is a wooden frame, with the sides and bottom of netted cords, of about 3 feet long and 2 broad, and 2 in depth . . . the journey being usually made in the night-time, it becomes the only place of his rest. . . . Had I been even much accustomed to this manner of travelling, it must have been irksome; but a total want of practice made it excessively grievous."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 104-105.

Caffer. Add:

In reference to the confusion of Pagans with Christians, through the application of this word to both, we add the following:

c. 1404. Of a people near China: "They were Christians after the manner of those of Cathay."—Clavijo by Markham, 141.

„ And of India. "The people of India are Christians, the Lord and most part of the people, after the manner of the Greeks; and among them also are other Christians who mark themselves with fire in the face, and their creed is different from that of the others; for those who thus mark themselves with fire are less esteemed than the others. And among them are Moors and Jews, but they are subject to the Christians."—Clavijo (orig.) § cxxi; comp. Markham, 153-4.

Here we have (1) the confusion of Caffer and Christian; and (2) the confusion of Abyssinia (India Tertia or Middle India of some medieval writers) with India Proper.

c. 1665. "It will appear in the sequel of this History, that the pretence used by Aureng-Zebe, his third Brother, to cut off his (Dara's) head, was that he was turned Kafer, that is to say, an Infidel, of no Religion, an Idolater."—Bernier, E. T., p. 3.

1678. "The Justices of the Choultry to turn Padry Pasquall, a Popish Priest, out of town, not to return again, and if it proves to be true that he attempted to seduce Mr. Mohun's Coffre Franck from the Protestant religion."—Ft. St. Geo. Cons. in Notes and Exts., Pt. i. p. 72.

Cafla. Add:

For "first quotation" read "second quotation."

Other examples of use for a sea-convoy:

1623. "Non navigammo di notte, perchè la cafla era molto grande, al mio parere di più di ducento vascelli."—P. della Valle, ii. 587.

1672. "Several times yearly numerous caflas of merchant barques, collected in the Portuguese towns, traverse this channel (the Gulf of Cambay), and these always await the greater security of the full moon. It is also observed that the vessels which go through with this voyage should not be joined and fastened with iron, for so great is the abundance of loadstone in the bottom, that indubitably such vessels go to pieces and break up."—P. Vincenzo, 109.

A curious survival of the old legend of the Loadstone Rocks.

Caimal, s. A Nair chief; a word often occurring in the old Portuguese historians. It is Malayālam, Kaimal.

1504. "So they consulted with the Zamorin, and the Moors offered their agency to send and poison the wells at Cochin, so as to kill all the Portuguese, and also to send Nairs in disguise to kill any of our people that they found in the palm-woods, and away from the town. . . . And meanwhile the Mangate Caimal, and the Caimal of Primbalam, and the Caimal of Diamper, seeing that the Zamorin's affairs were going from bad to worse, and that the castles which the Italians were making were all wind and nonsense, that it was already August when ships might be arriving from Portugal . . . departed to their own estates with a multitude of their followers, and sent to the King of Cochin their ollas of allegiance."—Correia, i. 482.

1566. ". . . certain Lords bearing title, whom they call Caimals" (caimões).—Damian de Goes, Chron. del Rei Dom Emmanuel, p. 49.

1606. "The Malabars give the name of Caimals (Caimais) to certain great lords of vassals, who are with their governments haughty as kings; but most of them have confederation and alliance with some of the great kings, whom they stand bound to aid and defend. . . ."—Gouvea, f. 27v.

"Picarão seus Caimais prezos e mortos."
Malacca Conquistada, v. 10.

Calamander Wood. Add:

1777. "In the Cingalese language Calamander is said to signify a black flaming tree. The heart, or woody part of it, is extremely handsome, with whitish or pale yellow and black or brown veins, streaks and waves."—Thunberg, iv. 205-6.

Calambac. Add:

1618. "We opened the ij chistes which came from Syam with callambac and silk and waid it out."—Cocks, ii. 51.

1774. "Les Mahometans font de ce Kalambac des chapelets qu'ils portent à la main par amusement. Ce bois quand il est échauffé ou un peu frutté, rend un odeur agréable."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 127.

Calash, s. French calèche, said by Littré to be a Slav word. In Bayly's Dict. it is calush and caloche. This seems to have been the earliest precursor of the buggy in Eastern settlements. Bayly defines it as 'a small open chariot.' The quotation below refers to Batavia, and the President in question was the Prest. of the English factory at Chusan, who, with his council, had been expelled from China, and was halting at Batavia on his way to India.

1702. "The Shabander riding home in his Calash this Morning, and seeing the President sitting without the door at his Lodgings, alighted and came and Sat with the President near an hour . . . what moved the Shabander to speak so plainly to the President thereof he knew not, But observed that the Shabander was in his Glasses at his first alighting from his Calash."—Procs. "Munday, 30th March." MS. Report in India Office.

Calcutta. Add:

It is well to note that in some early charts, such as that in Valentijn, and the oldest in the English Pilot, though Calcutta is not entered, there is a place on the Hoogly Calcuta, sometimes miswritten Calcuta, which leads to mistake. It is far below, near the modern Fulta.

1753. "Au dessous d'Ugli immédiatement, est l'établissement Hollandois de Shinshura, puis Shandernagor, établissement François, puis la loge Danoise,* et plus bas, sur le rivage opposé, qui est celui de la gauche en descendant, Banki-bazar,† où les Ostendois n'ont pu se maintenir; enfin Calicotta aux Anglois, à quelques lieues de Banki-bazar, et du même côté."—D'Anville, Éclaircissements, 64.

Caluat. Add:

1404. "And this Garden they call Talica, and in their tongue they call it Calbet."—Clavijo, § cix. Comp. Markham, 130.

1822. "I must tell you what a good fellow the little Raja of Tallaca is. When I visited him we sat on two musnads without exchanging one single word, in a very respectable durbar; but the moment we retired to a Khilwat the Raja produced his Civil and Criminal Register, and his Minute of demands, collections and balances for the last quarter, and began explaining the state of his country as eagerly as a young Collector."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 144.

Cameeze. Add:

1404. "And to the said Ruy Gonzalez he gave a big horse, an ambler, for they prize a horse that ambles, furnished with saddle and bridle, very well according to their fashion; and besides he gave him a camisa and an umbrella (sombrero)."—Clavijo, § lxxxix. (Markham, 100).

* Serampore.

† Almost opposite to the Danes Factory is Dankelankas, a Place where the Ostend Company settled a Factory, but, in Anno 1728, they quarrelled with the Fouadaar or Governor of Hughly, and he forced the Ostenders to quit. . . —A. Hamilton, n. 18.

Canarin, n. p. This name is applied in some of the quotations under Canara to the people of the district now so called by us. But the Portuguese applied it to the (Konkani) people of Goa and their language. Thus a Konkani grammar, originally prepared about 1600 by the Jesuit, Thomas Estevão (Stephens, an Englishman), printed at Goa, 1640, bears the title Arte da Lingoa Canarin. (See A. B(urnell) in Indian Antiq. ii. 98.

Candahar. Add:

a.—

1664. "All these great preparations give us cause to apprehend that, instead of going to Kachemire, we be not led to besiege that important city of Candahar, which is the Frontier to Persia, Indostan, and Usbeck, and the Capital of an excellent Country."—Bernier, E. T., p. 113.

1671.

"From Arachosia, from Candaor east, And Margiana to the Hyrcanian cliffs Of Caucasus. . . ."

Paradise Regained, iii.

c.

1814. "Candhar, eighteen miles from the wells, is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river; and a place of considerable trade; being a great thoroughfare from the sea coast to the Gaut mountains."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 206.

Cangue. Add:

1705. "I desir'd several Times to wait upon the Governour; but could not, he was so taken up with over-halling the Goods, that came from Pulo Condore, and weighing the Money, which was found to amount to 21,300 Tale. At last upon the 28th I was obliged to appear as a Criminal in Congas, before the Governour and his Grand Council, attended with all the Slaves in the Congas."—Letter from Mr. James Conyngnam, survivor of the Pulo Condore massacre; in Lockyer, p. 93. Lockyer adds: "I understood the Congas to be Thumbbolts," p. 95.

Canhameira, Conimere, n. p. Kanyimequ. A place on the Coromandel coast, which was formerly the site of European factories, between Pondicherry and Madras, about 13 miles north of the former.

1501. In Amerigo Vespucci's letter from C. Verde to Lorenzo de' Medici, giving an account of the Portuguese discoveries in India, he mentions on the Coast, before Marlepur, "Conimal."—In Baldelli-Boni, Introductio to Il Milione, p. liii.

1561. "On this coast there is a place called Canhameira, where there are so many deer and wild cattle that if a man wants to buy 500 deer-skins, within eight days the blacks of the place will give him delivery, catching them in snares, and giving two and three skins for a fanam."—Correa, ii. 722.

1680. "It is resolved to apply to the Soobidar of Sevagee's Country of Chengy for a Cowle to settle Factories at Cooraboar (?) and Coonemerro, and also at Porto Novo, if desired."—Ft. St. Geo. Consns., 7th Jan., in Notes and Exts. No. iii. p. 44.

1727. "Connymere or Gonjemeer is the next Place, where the English had a Factory many Years, but, on their purchasing Fort St. David, it was broken up. . . . At present its Name is hardly seen in the Map of Trade."—A. Ham. i. 357.

1753. "De Pondicheri, à Madras, la côte courten général nord-nord-est quelques degrés est. Le premier endroit de remarque est Congi-medu, vulgairement dit Congimer, à quatre lieues marines plus que moins de Pondicheri."—D'Anville, p. 123.

Canongo. Add:

1758. "Add to this that the King's Connegoes were maintained at our expense, as well as the Gomastahs and other servants belonging to the Zemindars, whose accounts we sent for."—Letter to Court, Decr. 31st. In Long, 157.

Canteroy. Add:

1790. "The full collections amounted to five Crores and ninety-two lacks of Canteroy Pagodas of 3 Rupees each."—Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 237.

1800. "Accounts are commonly kept in Canterraia Palams, and in an imaginary money containing 10 of these, by the Muslimans called chucrams, and by the English Canteroy Pagodas. . . ."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 129.

Canton. Add:

The Chin. name Kwang-tung (= 'Broad East') is an ellipsis for 'capital of the E. Division of the Province Liang-Kwang (or 'Two broad Realms')' (Bp. Moule).

1516. "So as this went on Fernão Peres arrived from Pacom with his cargo (of pepper), and having furnished himself with necessities set off on his voyage in June 1516 . . . they were 7 sail altogether, and they made their voyage with the aid of good pilots whom they had taken, and went without harming anybody touching at certain ports, most of which were subject to the King of China, who called himself the Son of God and Lord of the World. Fernão Peres arrived at the islands of China, and when he was seen there came an armed squadron of 12 junks, which in the season of navigation always cruized about, guarding the sea, to prevent the numerous pirates from attacking the ships. Fernão Peres knew about this from the pilots, and as it was late and he could not double a certain island there, he anchored, sending word to his captains to have their guns ready for defence if the Chins desired to fight. Next day he made sail toward the island of Veniaga, which is 18 leagues from the city of Cantão. It is on that island that all the traders buy and sell, without licence from the rulers of the city. . . . And 3 leagues from that island of Veniaga is another island, where is posted the Admiral or Captain-Major of the Sea, who immediately on the arrival of strangers at the isle of Veniaga reports to the rulers of Cantão, who they are, and what goods they bring or wish to buy; that the Rulers may send orders what course to take."—Correa, ii. 524.

Capass, s. The cotton-plant, and cotton-wool. H. kapās, from Skt. karpās, which seems as if it must be the origin of kápranos, though the latter is applied to flax.

1753. " . . . They cannot any way conceive the musters of 1738 to be a fit standard for judging by them of the cloth sent us this year, as the copass or country cotton has not been for these two years past under nine or ten rupees. . . ."—Ft. Willm. Cons. In Long, 40.

Capucat. Add:

1500. "This being done the Captain-Major (Pedralvares Cabral) made sail with the foresail and mizen, and went to the Port of Capocate which was attached to the same city of Calicut, and was a haven where there was a great loading of vessels and where many ships were moored that were all engaged in the trade of Calicut. . . ."—Correa, i. 207.

Caravanseray. Add:

1404. "And next day being Tuesday, they departed thence and going about 2 leagues arrived at a great house like an Inn, which they call Carabansaea (read, -sara), and here were Chacatays looking after the Emperor's horses."—Clavijo, § xcvi. Comp. Markham, p. 114.

Carboy. Add:

1754. "I delivered a present to the Governor, consisting of oranges and lemons, with several sorts of dried fruits, and six karboys of Isfahan wine."—Hanway, i. 102.

Carcana.

1663. "There are also found many raised Walks and Tents in sundry Places, that are the offices of several Officers. Besides these are many great Halls that are called Kar-Kanays, or Places where Handy-craftsmen do work."—Bernier, E. T., 83.

Caréns, n. p. Burm. Ka-reng. A name applied to a group of non-Burmese tribes, settled in the forest and hill tracts of Pegu and the adjoining parts of Burma, from Mergui in the south, to beyond Toungoo in the north, and from Arakan to the Salwen, and beyond that river far into Siamese territory. They do not know the name Kareng, nor have they one name for their own race; distinguishing, among those whom we call Karens, three tribes, Sgaw, Pwo, and Bghai, which differ somewhat in customs and traditions, and especially in language.

"The results of the labours among them of the American Baptist Mission have the appearance of being almost miraculous, and it is not going too far to state that the cessation of blood feuds, and the peaceable way in which the various tribes are living . . . and have lived together since they came under British rule, is far more due to the influence exercised over them by the missionaries than to the measures adopted by the English Government, beneficial as these have doubtless been" (Br. Burma Gazetteer). The author of this excellent work should not, however, have admitted the quotation of Dr. Mason's fanciful notion about the identity of Marco Polo's Carajan with Karen, which is totally groundless.

1759. "There is another People in this Country called Carianners, whiter than either (Burmans or Peguans), distinguished into Buragmah and Pegu Carianners; they live in the woods, in small Societies, of ten or twelve houses; are not wanting in industry, though it goes no farther than to procure them an annual subsistence."—In Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 100.

1799. "From this reverend father (V. Sangermano) I received much useful information. He told me of a singular description of people called Carayners or Carians, that inhabit different parts of the country, particularly the western provinces of Dalla and Bassein, several societies of whom also dwell in the district adjacent to Rangoon. He represented them as a simple, innocent race, speaking a language distinct from that of the Birmans, and entertaining rude notions of religion. . . . They are timorous, honest, mild in their manners, and exceedingly hospitable to strangers."—Symes, p. 207.

c. 1819. "We must not omit here the Carian, a good and peaceable people, who live dispersed through the forests of Pegu, in small villages consisting of 4 or 5 houses . . . they are totally dependent upon the despotic government of the Burmese."—Sangermano, p. 34.

Carnatic. Add:

1762. "With this immense force he made an incursion into the Karnatic Balaghaut."—Hist. of Hydur Naik, 148.

Carrack. Add:

1403. "The prayer being concluded, and the storm still going on, a light like a candle appeared in the cage at the mast-head of the carraca, and another light on the spar that they call bowsprit (bauprés) which is fixed in the forecastle; and another light like a candle in una vara de espínelo (?) over the poop, and these lights were seen by as many as were in the carrack, and were called up to see them, and they lasted awhile and then disappeared, and all this while the storm did not cease, and by-and-by all went to sleep except the steersman and certain sailors of the watch."—Clavio, § xiii. Comp. Markham, p. 13.

Caryota. This is the botanical name (Caryota urens, L.) of a magnificent palm, growing in the moister forest regions, as in the Western Ghats and in Eastern Bengal, in Ceylon, and in Burma. A conspicuous character is presented by its enormous bipinnate leaves, somewhat resembling colossal bracken-fronds, 15 to 25 feet long, 10 to 12 in width; also by the huge pendent clusters of its inflorescence and seeds, the latter like masses of rosaries 10 feet long and upwards. It affords much toddy (q.v.) made into spirit and sugar, and is the tree chiefly affording those products in Ceylon, where it is called Kitul. It also affords a kind of sago, and a woolly substance found at the foot of the leaf-stalks is sometimes used for caulking, and forms a good tinder. The sp. name urens is derived from the acrid, burning taste of the fruit. It is called, according to Brandis, the Mhâr-palm in Western India. We know of no Hindustani or familiar Anglo-Indian name. The name Caryota seems taken from Pliny, but his application is to a kind of date-palm; his statement that it afforded the best wine of the East probably suggested the transfer.

c. A.D. 70. "Ab his caryotæ maxume celebrantur, et cibo quidem sed et suco uberrimæ, ex quibus præcipua vina orienti, iniqua capiti, unde pomo nomen."—Pliny, xiii., § 9.

1681. "The next tree is the Kettule. It groweth straight, but not so tall or big as a Coker-Nut-Tree; the inside nothing but a white pith, as the former. It yieldeth a sort of Liqueur . . . very sweet and pleasing to the Pallate. . . . The which Liqueur they boyl and make a kind of brown sugar called Jaggory, etc."—Knox, p. 15.

1777. "The Caryota urens, called the Saguer tree, grew between Salatiga and Kopping, and was said to be the real tree from whichsago is made."—Thunberg, E. T., iv. 149.

A mistake, however.

1861. See quotation under Peepul.

Cassowary. Add:

1631. "De Emeu, vulgo Casuaris. In insula Ceram, aliisque Moluccensibus vicinis insulis, celebris haec avis reperitur."—Jac. Bontii, lib. v., c. 18.

1632. "On the islands Sumatra (?), Banda, and other adjoining islands of the Moluccas there is a certain bird, which by the natives is called Emeu or Eme, but otherwise is commonly named by us Kasuaris."—Nieuwhof, ii. 231.

Caste. Add to the statement about Right and Left-hand Castes:

Sir Walter Elliot considers this feud to be "nothing else than the occasional outbreak of the smouldering antagonism between Brahmanism and Buddhism, although in the lapse of ages both parties have lost sight of the fact. The points on which they split now are mere trifles, such as parading on horseback or in a palankeen in procession, erecting a pandal or marriage shed on a given number of pillars, and claiming to carry certain flags, etc. The right-hand party is headed by the Brahmins, and includes the Parias, who assume the van, beating their tom-toms when they come to blows. The chief of the left-hand are the Panchalars [i.e., the Five Classes, workers in metal and stone, etc.], followed by the Pallars and workers in leather, who sound their long trumpets and engage the Parias." (In J. Ethnol. Soc., N. S., 1869, p. 112.)

Castees. Add:

1701-2. In the MS. Returns of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. the E. I. Company, in the India Office, for this year, we find, "4th (in Council) Matt. Empson, Sea Customer, marry'd Castees," and under 1702, "13. Charles Bugden . . . marry'd Casteez."

Casuarina, s. A tree,—Casuarina muricata, Roxb. (N. O. Casuarineae)—indigenous on the coast of Chittagong and the Burmese provinces, and southward as far as Queensland. It was introduced into Bengal by Dr. F. Buchanan, and has been largely adopted as an ornamental tree both in Bengal and in Southern India. The tree has a considerable superficial resemblance to a larch or other finely-feathered conifer, making a very acceptable variety in the hot plains, where real pines will not grow.

1861. See quotation under Peepul.

1867. "Our road lay chiefly by the sea-coast, along the white sands, which were fringed for miles by one grand continuous line or border of casuarina trees."—Lt.-Col. Lewin, 362.

1879. "It was lovely in the white moon-light, with the curving shadows of palms on the dewy grass, the grace of the drooping casuarinas, the shining water, and the long drift of surf. . . ."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 275.

Cathay. Add:

1664. "'Tis not yet twenty years, that there went Caravans every year from Kachenire, which crossed all those mountains of the great Tibet, entered into Tartary, and arrived in about three months at Cataja . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 136.

Cat's Eye. Add:

c. 1340. "Quaedam regiones monetam non habent, sed pro ea utuntur lapidibus quos dicimus Cati Oculos."—Conti, in Poggius De Var. Fortunae, lib. iv.

1672. "The Cat's-eyes, by the Portuguese called Ollios de Gatos, occur in Zeylon, Cambaya, and Pegu; they are more esteemed by the Indians than by the Portuguese; for some Indians believe that if a man wears this stone his power and riches will never diminish, but always increase."—Baldacrus, Germ. ed. 160.

Catty. The Chinese name of this weight is K'in (or Ch'in).

The weight of 1.33 lb. avrd. is fixed by treaty; but in Chinese trade it varies from 4 oz. to 28 oz.; the lowest value being used by tea-vendors at Peking, the highest by coal-merchants in Honan.

Cavally. Add:

I should have spoken still more guardedly as to the identity of this fish, had I known that Dr. F. Day hesitates to identify it. The fish mentioned in the two first of the following quotations appears to be the same that has been already spoken of; but that in the third seems doubtful.

1652. "There is another very small fish vulgarly called Cavalle, which is good enough to eat, but not very wholesome."—Philippus a Sanct. Trinitate, in Fr. Tr. 383.

1796. "The ayla, called in Portuguese cavala, has a good taste when fresh, but when salted becomes like the herring."—Fra Paolo, E. T., p. 240.

1875. "Caranx dent (Bl. Schn.) This fish of wide range from the Mediterranean the coast of Brazil, at St. Helena is known as the Cavalley, and is one of the best table fish, being indeed the salmon of St. Helena. It is taken in considerable numbers, chiefly during the summer months around the coast, in not very deep water: it varies in length from nine inches up to two or three feet."—St. Helena, by J. C. Melliss, p. 106.

Cazee. Add:

The short article in the GLOSSARY gives no information as to the position of the Kāzī in British India. It is not easy to give an accurate account of this matter, which has gone through variations of which a distinct record cannot be found. But the following outline is believed to be substantially correct:

Under Adawlut in SUPPT. I have given a brief sketch of the history of the judiciary under the Company in the Bengal Presidency. Down to 1790 the greater part of the administration of criminal justice was still in the hands of native judges, and other native officials of various kinds, though under European supervision in varying forms. But the native judiciary, except in positions of a quite subordinate character, then ceased. It was, however, still in substance Mahomedan law that was administered in criminal cases, and also in civil cases between Mahomedans as affecting succession, etc. And a Kāzī and a Mufti were retained in the Provincial Courts of Appeal and Circuit as the exponents of Mahomedan law, and the deliverers of a formal futwa. There was also a Kāzī-at-Kozāt, or chief kāzī of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, attached to the Sudder Courts of Dewanny and Nizamut, assisted by two muftis, and these also gave written futwas on references from the district courts.

The style of Kāzī and Mufti presumably continued in formal existence in connexion with the Sudder Courts till the abolition of these in 1862; but with the earlier abolition of the Provincial Courts in 1829-31 it had quite ceased, in this sense, to be familiar. In the district courts the corresponding exponents were in English officially designated Law-officers, and, I believe, in official vernacular, as well as commonly among Anglo-Indians, Moolvees (q.v., i.e., Maulavis).

Under the article Law-officer in SUPPT., it will be seen that certain trivial cases were, at the discretion of the magistrate, referred for disposal by the Law-officer of the district. And the latter, from this fact, as well as, perhaps, from the tradition of the elders, was in some parts of Bengal popularly known as 'the Kāzī.' "In the Magistrate's office," writes my friend Mr. Seton-Karr, "it was quite common to speak of this case as referred to the joint magistrate, and that to the Chhoṭā Sahib (the Assistant), and that again to the Kāzī."

But the duties of the Kāzī popularly so styled and officially recognized, had, almost from the beginning of the century, become limited to certain notarial functions, to the performance and registration of Mahomedan marriages, and some other matters connected with the social life of their co-religionists. To these functions must also be added, as regards the last century and the earlier years of the present one, duties in connection with distraint for rent on behalf of Zemindars. There were such Kāzīs nominated by Government in towns and pergunnas, with great variation in the area of the localities over which they officiated. The Act XI. of 1864, which repealed the laws relating to law-officers, put an end also to the appointment by Government of Kāzīs. But this seems to have led to inconveniences which were complained of by Mahomedans in some parts of India, and it was enacted in 1880 (Act XII., styled "The Kāzīs Act") that with reference to any particular locality, and after consultation with the chief Musulman residents therein, the Local Government might select and nominate a Kāzī or Kazis for that local area. See in SUPPT. Futwa, Law-officer, Mufti.

1684. "January 12.—From Cassumbazar 'tis advised ye Merchants and Picars appeal again to ye Cazee for Justice against Mr. Charnock. Ye Cazee cites Mr. Charnock to appear. . . ."—Hedges, p. 147.

1773. "That they should be mean, weak, ignorant and corrupt is not surprising, when the salary of the principal judge, the Cazī, does not exceed Rs. 100 per month."—From Impey's Judgment in the Patna Cause, quoted by Stephen, ii. 176.

1790. "Regulations for the Courts of Circuit."

"24. That each of the Courts of Circuit be superintended by two covenanted civil servants of the Company, to be denominated Judges of the Courts of Circuit . . . assisted by a Kāzī and a Mufti."—Reyns.

for the Adm. of Justice in the Foujdarry or Criminal Courts in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. Passed by the G.-G. in C., Dec. 3, 1790.

"32. . . . The charge against the prisoner, his confession, which is always to be received with circumspection and tenderness . . . etc. . . . being all heard and gone through in his presence and that of the Kazi and Mufti of the Court, the Kazi and Mufti are then to write at the bottom of the record of the proceedings held in the trial, the futwa or law as applicable to the circumstances of the case . . . The Judges of the Court shall attentively consider such futwa, etc."—Id.

1791. "The Judges of the Courts of Circuit shall refer to the Kazi and Mufti of their respective courts all questions on points of law . . . regarding which they may not have been furnished with specific instructions from the G.-G. in C. or the Nizamut Adawlut. . . ."—Regn. No. XXXV.

1792. Revenue Regulation of July 20, No. lxxv., empowers Landholders and Farmers of Land to distrain for Arrears of Rent or Revenue. The "Kazi of the Pergunnah" is the official under the Collector, repeatedly referred to as regulating and carrying out the distraint. So, again, in Regn. XVII. of 1793.

1793. "lxvi. The Nizamut Adawlat shall continue to be held at Calcutta.

"lxvii. The Court shall consist of the Governor-General, and the members of the Supreme Council, assisted by the head Cauzy of Bengal Behar, and Orissa, and two Muftis." *—Regn. IX. of 1793. See also quotation under Mufti.

"I. Cauzies are stationed at the Cities of Patna, Dacca, and Moorshedabad, and the principal towns, and in the pergunnahs, for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages, and performing such religious duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan law, as have been hitherto discharged by them under the British Government."—Reg. XXXIX. of 1793.

1803. Regulation XLVI. regulates the appointment of Cauzy in towns and pergunnahs, "for the purpose of preparing and attesting deeds of transfer, and other law papers, celebrating marriages," etc., but makes no allusion to judicial duties.

1864. "Whereas it is unnecessary to continue the offices of Hindoo and Mahomedan Law Officers, and is inexpedient that the appointment of Cazee-ool-Cozaat, or of City, Town, or Pergunnah Cazees should be made by Government, it is enacted as follows:

* * *

"II. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed so as to prevent a Cazee-ool-Cozaat or other Cazee from performing, when required to do so, any duties or ceremonies prescribed by the Mahomedan Law.'—Act No. XI. of 1864.

1880. "An Act for the appointment of persons to the office of Kazi."

"Whereas by the preamble to Act No. XI. of 1864 . . . it was (among other things declared inexpedient, etc.) . . . and whereas by the usage of the Muhammadan community in some parts of British India the presence of Kazis appointed by the Government is required at the celebration of marriages and the performance of certain other rites and ceremonies, and it is therefore expedient that the Government should again be empowered to appoint persons to the office of Kazi; It is hereby enacted . . ."—Act No. XII. of 1880.

1885. "To come to something more specific. 'There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripe of the vile alguazils of Impey' [Macaulay's Essay on Hastings].

"Here we see one Cazi turned into an indefinite number of 'men of the most venerable dignity;' a man found guilty by legal process of corruptly oppressing a helpless widow into 'men of the most venerable dignity' persecuted by extortioners without a cause; and a guard of sepoy, with which the Supreme Court had nothing to do, into 'vile alguazils of Impey.'"—Stephen, Story of Uncommon, ii. 250-251.

Ceylon. Add:

c. 1337. "I met in this city (Brussa) the pious sheikh 'Abd-Allah-al-Misri, the Traveller. He was a worthy man. He made the circuit of the earth, except he never entered China, nor the island of Sarandib, nor Andalusia, nor the Sudan. I have excelled him, for I have visited those regions!"—Ibn Batuta, ii. 321.

1781. "We explored the whole coast of Zelone, from Pt. Pedro to the Little Basses, looked into every port and spoke with every vessel we saw, without hearing of French vessels."—Price's Letter to Ph. Francis, in Tracts, i. 9.

"For dearer to him are the shells that sleep

By his own sweet native stream,

Than all the pearls of Serendeeep,

Or the Ava ruby's gleam!

Home! Home! Friends—health—repose,

What are Golconda's gems to those?"

Bengal Annual.

Chabootra. Add:

1827. "The splendid procession, having entered the royal gardens, approached through a long avenue of lofty trees, a chabootra or platform of white marble canopied by arches of the same material."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

Chandernagore.

See under Calcutta in SUPPL.

* This was already in the Regulations of 1791.

Chawbuck. Add:

1760. "Mr. Barton, laying in wait, seized Benautrom Chattogee opposite to the door of the Council, and with the assistance of his bearer and his peons tied his hands and his feet, swung him upon a bamboo like a hog, carried him to his own house, there with his own hand chawbooked him in the most cruel manner, almost to the deprivation of life; endeavoured to force beef into his mouth, to the irreparable loss of his Bramin's caste, and all this without giving ear to, or suffering the man to speak in his own defence . . ."—Fort Wm. Consn., in Long, 214–215.

Chelingo. Add:

We find Tam. "djalanga, qui va sur l'eau; chalanque, barque, bateau dont les planches sont clouées" (Dict. Tam. Franç., Pondichéry, 1855).

1746.

"Chillinga hire . . . 0 22 0"
Account charges at Fort St. David,
Decr. 31st. MS. in India Office.

1761. "It appears there is no more than one frigate that has escaped; therefore don't lose an instant to send us chelingoes upon chelingoes loaded with rice . . ."—Lally to Raymond at Pulicat. In Comp. H. of the War in India (Tract), 1761, p. 85.

Cherry fougj. H. Charī-fauj? This curious phrase occurs in the quotations, the second of which explains its meaning. I am not certain what the first part is, but it is most probably charī, in the sense of 'moveable,' 'locomotive,' so that the phrase was equivalent to "flying brigade." It was evidently a technicality of the Mahratta armies.

1803. "The object of a cherry fougj, without guns, with two armies after it, must be to fly about and plunder the richest country it can find, not to march through exhausted countries, to make revolutions in cities."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 59.

1809. "Two detachments under . . . Mahratta chiefs of some consequence, are now employed in levying contributions in different parts of the Jypoor country. Such detachments are called churee fougj; they are generally equipped very lightly, with but little artillery; and are equally formidable in their progress to friend and foe."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 128.

Chicane. Add:

The game of chaugan, the ball (gū or gavī), and the playing-ground (maidān) afford constant metaphors in Persian literature.

1516. Barbosa, speaking of the Mahomedans of Cambay, says:

"Saom tam ligeiros e manhosos na sela que a cavallo jogam ha choqua, ho qual joguo eles tem antre sy na conta em que nos temos ho das canas."—Lisbon ed. 271.

i.e. "They are so swift and dexterous in the saddle that they play choqa on horseback, a game which they hold in as high esteem as we do that of the canes" (i.e. the jereed).

Tenreiro, speaking of the Arabs, says:

1560. "They are such great riders that they play tennis on horseback" (que jogão a choqa a cavallo).—Itinerario, ed. 1762, 359.

In the following I would say, in justice to the great man whose words are quoted, that chicane is used in the quasi-military sense of taking every possible advantage of the ground in a contest:

1761. "I do suspect that some of the great Ones have had hopes given them that the Dutch may be induced to join us in this War against the Spaniards,—if such an Event should take place I fear some Sacrifices will be made in the East Indies—I pray God my Suspicions may be without foundation. I think Delays and Chicanery is allowable against those who take Advantage of the times, our Distresses, and situation."—Unpublished Holograph Letter from Lord Clive, in India Office Records. Dated Berkeley Square, and indorsed 27th Decr. 1761."

Chick, a. Add:

Chicks are described by Clavijo in the tents of Timour's chief wife:

1404. "And this tent had two doors, one in front of the other, and the first doors were of certain thin coloured wands, joined one to another like in a hurdle, and covered on the outside with a texture of rose-coloured silk, and finely woven; and these doors were made in this fashion, in order that when shut the air might yet enter, whilst those within could see those outside, but those outside could not see those who were within."—§ cxxvi.

Chilao. Add:

1543. "The Governor quitting Cochín proceeded along the coast to Cape Comorin, doubled the cape, and then ran along that coast to Beadala, which is a place adjoining the shoals of Chilao . . ."—Correa, iii. 324. See also SUPPT., under Chittagong.

Chillumbrum. Add:

1755. "Scheringham (Serigam), Schalembron, et Gengy m'offroient également la retraite après laquelle je soupairosi."—Anquetil du Perron, Zendav. Disc. Prelim. xxviii.

Chillumchee. Add:

1857. "I went alone to the Fort Adjutant, to report my arrival, and inquire to what regiment of the Bengal army I was likely to be posted.

"Army!—regiment!" was the reply. "There is no Bengal Army; it is all in revolt. . . . Provide yourself with a campbedstead, and a chillumchee, and wait for orders."

"I saluted and left the presence of my superior officer, deeply pondering as to the possible nature and qualities of a chillumchee, but not venturing to enquire further."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 3.

China.

The word is used in the sense of a china dish in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 492.

Chinapatam. Add:

With regard to the note (p. 153, col. b) suggesting the existence of this name long before the foundation of the English settlement, I may add this passage from the English translation of Mendoza's Chinn, the original of which was published in 1585, the translation by R. Parkc in 1588:

"... it is plainly seen that they did come with the shipping vnto the Indies . . . so that at this day there is great memory of them in the Ilands Philippinas and on the coast of Coromande, which is the coast against the Kingdome of Norsinga towards the sea of Bengala (misprinted Cengala); whereas is a towne called vnto this day the Soile of the Chinos for that they did recedite and make the same" (i. 94).

I strongly suspect, comparing what Barros says, that this was Chinapatam, or Madras.

1780. "The Nawaub sent him to Cheena Pattun (Madras) under the escort of a small party of light Cavalry."—H. of Hydur Nuk, 395.

Chinsura. See under Calcutta, in SUPPT.

1684. "This day between 3 and 6 o'clock in the Afternoon, Capt. Richardson and his Sergeant, came to my house in y<sup>e</sup> Chinchera, and brought me this following message from y<sup>e</sup> President. . . ."—Hedges, Diary, 166.

Chit. Add:

1787. "Mrs. Arend . . . will wait upon any Lady at her own house on the shortest notice, by addressing a chit to her in Chattawala Gully, opposite Mr. Motte's old house, Tiretta's bazar."—Adv't., in Seton-Karr, i. 226.

Chittagong. Add at end:

Chaturgrama is still the name of a town in Ceylon, lat. 6°, long. 81°.

Chobwa, s. Burmese Tsaubwa, Siamese Chao, 'prince, king,' also Chao-hpa (compounded with hpa, 'heaven'), and in Cushing's Shan Dicty. and cacography, sow, 'lord, master,' sow-hpa, a 'hereditary prince.' The word chu-hu, for 'chief,' is found applied among tribes of Kwang-si, akin to the Shans, in A.D. 1150 (Prof. T. de la Couperie).

The designation of the princes of the Shan States on the east of Burma, many of whom are (or were till recently) tributary to Ava.

1795. "After them came the Chobwaas, or petty tributary princes: these are personages who, before the Birmans had extended their conquests over the vast territories which they now possess, had held small independent sovereignties which they were able to maintain so long as the balance of power continued doubtful between the Birmans, Peguers, and Siamese."—Symes, 366.

1819. "All that tract of land . . . is inhabited by a numerous nation called Sciama, who are the same as the Laos. Their kingdom is divided into small districts under different chiefs called Zaboâ, or petty princes."—Saengermano, 34.

1855. "The Tsaubwas of all these principalities, even where most absolutely under Ava, retain all the forms and appurtenances of royalty."—Mission to Ava, 303.

Choky. Add:

a.—

1664. "Near this Tent there is another great one, which is called Tchaukykane, because it is the place where the Omrahs keep guard, every one in his turn, once a week twenty-four hours together."—Bernier, E. T., 117.

b.—

c. 1782. "As soon as morning appeared he (Haidar) sat down on his chair (chaunki) and washed his face."—H. of Hydur Nuk, 505.

Chop. Add (at p. 160, col. 1, line 21, before "Drummond"):

"While chapa is used all over the N.W.P. and Punjab for printed cotton stuff."

Also:

1682. "To Rajemaul I sent ye old Duan . . . 's Pervanna, Chopt both by the Nabob and new Duan, for its confirmation."—Hedges, Hak. Soc., 37.

c. 1720. "Here they demanded tax and toll; felt us all over, not excepting our mouths, and when they found nothing, stamped a chop upon our arms in red paint; which was to serve for a pass."—Zesteen Jaarige Reize . . . door Jacob de Bucquoy, Haarlem, 1757.

Choul. Add:

1782. "That St. Lubin had some of the Maharratta officers on board of his ship, at the port of Choul . . . he will remember as long as he lives, for they got so far the ascendancy over the political Frenchman, as to induce him to come into the harbour, and to land his cargo of military stores . . . not one piece of which he ever got back again, or was paid sixpence for."—Price's Observations on a Late Publication, &c., 14. In Price's Tracts, vol. i.

Choultry. Add:

1714. In the MS. List of Persons in the Service, &c. (India Office Records), we have:—

"Josiah Cooke ffactor Register of the Choultry, £15."

c. 1790. "On ne rencontre dans ces voyages aucune auberge ou hôtellerie sur la route; mais elles sont remplacées par des lieux de repos appelées schultris (chauderies), qui sont des bâtimens ouverts et inhabités, où les voyageurs ne trouvent, en général, qu'un toit . . ."—Haafner, ii. 11.

Chouse. Add:

"In Kattywar, where the native chiefs employ Arab mercenaries, the Chaus still flourishes as officer of a company. When I joined the Political Agency in that Province, there was a company of Arabs attached to the Residency under a Chaus." (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1619. "Con gli ambasciatori stranieri che seco conduceva, cioè l'Indiano, di Sciah Selim, un clauso Turco ed i Moscoviti. . ."—P. della Valle, ii. 6.

1754. "900 chiaux: they carried in their hand a baton with a double silver crook on the end of it; . . . these frequently chanted moral sentences and encomiums on the SHAH, occasionally proclaiming also his virtues as he passed along."—Hanway, i. 170.

1762. "Le 27<sup>e</sup> d'Août 1762 nous entendimes un coup de canon du chateau de Kähira, c'étoit signe qu'un Tsjaus (courier) étoit arrivé de la grande caravane."—Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 171.

Chow-chow. Add:

We find the word in Blumentritt's Vocabular of Manilla terms: "Chau-chau, a Tagal dish so called."

Chowdry. Add, before quotations:

In a paper of 'Explanations of Terms,' furnished to the council at Fort William by Warren Hastings, then Resident at Moradbagh (1759), chowdrees are defined as "Landholders in the next rank to Zemindars." (In Long, p. 176.)

It is also an honorific title given by servants to one of their number, usually, we believe, to the mālī, or gardener,—as khalīfa to the cook and tailor, jama'dār to the bhishtā, mehrar to the sweeper, sirdār to the bearer.

Chownee, s. The usual native name, at least in the Bengal Presidency, for an Anglo-Indian cantonment (q.v.). It is H. chhāonī, from chhān, 'a thatched roof,' chhānā, v. 'to thatch.'

Chowringhee. Add:

1792. "For Private Sale. A neat, compact, and new built garden house, pleasantly situated at Chouringy, and from its contiguity to Fort William peculiarly well calculated for an officer; it would likewise be a handsome provision for a native lady, or a child. The price is 1500 sicca rupees."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 541.

1803. "Chouringhee, an entire village of palaces, runs for a considerable length at right angles with it, and altogether forms the finest view I ever beheld in any city."—Ld. Valentia, i. 236.

1810. "As I enjoyed Calcutta much less this time . . . I left it with less regret. Still, when passing the Chowringhee road the last day, I—

'Looked on stream and sea and plain

As what I ne'er might see again.'

Elphinstone, in Life, i. 231.

1848. "He wished all Cheltenham, all Chowringhee, all Calcutta, could see him in that position, waving his hand to such a beauty, and in company with such a famous buck as Rawdon Crawley, of the Guards."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 237.

Chowry. Add:

1827. "A black female slave, richly dressed, stood behind him with a chowry, or cow's tail, having a silver handle, which she used to keep off the flies."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, chap. x.

Choya.

1583. "Ne vien anchora di detta saia da un altro luogo detto Petopoli, e se ne tingono parimente in S. Thomè. . ."—Balbi, f. 107.

Chucker. a. See also Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly, etc., p. 47.

Chucklah, s. H. chakla. A territorial subdivision under the Mahomedan government, thus defined by Warren Hastings, in the paper quoted under Chowdry:

1759. "The jurisdiction of a Phojdar (see Faujdar), who receives the rents from the Zemindars, and accounts for them with the Government."

1760. "In the treaty concluded with the Nawáb Meer Mohummud Cásim Khán, on the 27th Sept. 1760, it was agreed that . . . the English army should be ready to assist him in the management of all affairs, and that the lands of the chuklahs (districts) of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong, should be assigned for all the charges of the company and the army . . .”—Harington's Analysis of the Laws and Regulations, vol. i. Calcutta, 1808-1809, p. 5.

Chuckler. Add:

c. 1790. “Aussi n'est-ce que le rebut de la classe méprisée des parias; savoir les tschakelis ou cordonniers et les vettians ou fossoyeurs, qui s'occupent de l'enterrement et de la combustion des morts.”—Haafner, ii. 60.

Chuckmuck, s. II. chakmak. Flint and steel. One of the titles conferred on Haidar 'Ali before he rose to power was 'Chakmak Jang, 'Firelock of war?' See Hist. of Hydlur Naik, 112.

Chudder. Add:

1673. “The habit of these water-nymphs was fine Shudders of lawn embroidered on the neck, wrist, and skirt with a border of several coloured silks or threads of gold.”—Herbert, 3rd ed., 191.

Chullo! v. in imperative; ‘Go on! Be quick.’ Chalo! imper. of chala!, to go, go speedily.

c. 1790. “Je montai de très-bonne heure dans mon palanquin.—Tschollo (c'est-à-dire, marche), crièrent mes coulis, et aussitôt le voyage commença.”—Haafner, ii. 5.

Chumpuk. Add:

The use of the term champaka extends to the Philippine Islands.

Chunárgurh, n. p. A famous rock-fort on the Ganges, above Benares, and on the right bank. The name is believed to be a corruption of Charanagiri, ‘Foot Hill,’ a name probably given from the actual resemblance of the rock, seen in longitudinal profile, to a human foot.

Chupra. Add:

1665. “The Holland Company have a House there (at Patna) by reason of their trade in Salt Peter, which they refine at a great Town called Choupar . . . 10 leagues above Patna.”—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 53.

Churruck. Add:

c. 1430. “Alii ad ornandos currus perforato latere, fune per corpus immisso se ad currum suspendunt, pendentesque et ipsi examinati idolum comitantur; id optimum sacrificium putant et acceptissimum deo.”—Conti in Poggius, De Var. Fortunae, iv.

Chuttanutt. Add:

1753. “The Hoogly Phousdar demanding the payment of the ground rent for 4 months from January, namely:—

Buxies	1	8	0

Agreed that the President do pay the same out of cash.”—Consn. Ft. William, April 30, in Long, 43.

Circars. Add:

1767. “Letter from the Chief and Council at Masulipatam . . . . that in consequence of orders from the President and Council of Fort St. George for securing and sending away all vagrant Europeans that might be met with in the Circars, they have embarked there for this place. . . .”—Fort William Consn. Feb. 6, in Long, 476-7.

Civilian. Add:

1848. (Lady O'Dowd's) “quarrel with Lady Smith, wife of Minos Smith the puisne Judge, is still remembered by some at Madras, when the Colonel's lady snapped her fingers in the Judge's lady's face, and said she'd never walk behind ever a beggarly civilian.”—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 85.

Classy. Add:

1801. “The sepoys in a body were to bring up the rear. Our left flank was to be covered by the sea, and our right by Gopie Nath's men. Then the clashies and other armed followers.”—Mt. Stewart Elphinstone, in Life, i. 27.

Coast. Add:

1781. “Just imported from the Coast . . . a very fine assortment of the following cloths.”—India Gazette, Sept. 15.

Cobra de Capello. Add:

1710. “The Brother Francisco Rodriguez persevered for the whole 40 days in these exercises, and as the house was of clay, and his cell adjoined the garden, it was invaded by cobra de capelo, and he made report of this inconvenience to the Father lector. But his answer was that these were not the snakes that did spiritual harm; and so left the Brother in the same cell. This and other admirable instances have always led me to doubt if S. Paul did not communicate to his Paulists in India the same virtue as of the tongues of S. Paul, for the snakes in these parts are so numerous and so venomous, and though our Missionaries make such long journeys through wild uncultivated places, there is no account to this day that any Paulist was ever bitten.”—P. de Souza, Oriente Conquistado, Cong. i. Div. i. cap. 73.

* Lingue di San Paolo is a name given to fossil shark's teeth, which are commonly found in Malta, and in parts of Sicily.

c. 1713. "En secouant la peau de cerf sur laquelle nous avons coutume de nous asseoir, il en sortit un gros serpent de ceux qu'on appelle en Portugais Cobra-Capel."—Lettres Édifiantes, ed. 1781, xi. 83.

Cochin. Add:

1767. "From this place the Nawaub marched to Koochi-Bundur, from the inhabitants of which he exacted a large sum of money."—H. of Hydur Naik, 186.

Cockroach. Add:

1577. "We were likewise annoyed not a little by the biting of an Indian fly called Cacaroch, a name agreeable to its bad condition; for living it vext our flesh; and being kill'd smelt as loathsomely as the French punaise, whose smell is odious."—Herbert's Travels, 3rd ed. 332-3.

Coco: Add before the quotations:

But Brugsch, describing from the Egyptian wall-paintings of c. B.C. 1600, on the temple of Queen Hashop, representing the expeditions by sea which she sent to the Incense Land of Punt, says:

"Men never seen before, the inhabitants of this divine land, showed themselves on the coast, not less astonished than the Egyptians. . . . They lived on pile-buildings, in little dome-shaped huts, the entrance to which was effected by a ladder, under the shade of cocoa-palms laden with fruit, and splendid incense-trees, on whose boughs strange fowls rocked themselves, and at whose feet herds of cattle peacefully reposed."—Brugsch, 2d ed. i. 353.

Also with reference to note on p. 175:

c. A.D. 70. "In ipsâ quidem Aethiopiâ fricator haec, tanta est siccitas, et farinae modo spissatur in panem. Gignitur autem in frutice ramis cubitalibus, folio latiore, pomo rotundo majore quam mali amplitudine, coicas vocant."—Pliny, xiii. § 9.

c. 1340. "Le nargil, appelé autrement noie d'Inde, auquel on ne peut comparer aucun autre fruit, est vert et rempli d'huile."—Shihâbuddîn Dimishkî, in Not. et Exts. xiii. 175.

Coco-de-Mer. Add:

We have learned from Mr. H. C. P. Bell, Ceylon C. S., the author of the Report on the Maldives, quoted on p. 178, col. α, that in Maldivian tava or tâva=Singh. tada, i.e., 'hard'; so that tâva-kârhi is the 'hard-shelled coco-nut.' Hence Sonnerat is mistaken in saying that the term means 'treasure-nut.'

Colao, s. Chin. Koh-lao, 'Council Chamber Elders' (Bp. Moule). A title for a Chinese Minister of State, which frequently occurs in the Jesuit writers of the 17th century.

Coleroon. Add:

c. 1713. "Les deux Princes . . . se liguerent contre l'ennemi commun, à fin de le contraindre par la force des armes à rompre une digue si préjudiciable à leurs Etats. Ils faisoient déjà de grands préparatifs, lorsque le fleuve Coloran vengea par lui-même (comme on s'exprimoit ici) l'affront que le Roi faisoit à ses eaux en les retenant captives."—Lettres Édifiantes, ed. 1781, xi. 180.

1753. ". . . en doublant le Cap Callamedu, jusqu'à la branche du fleuve Caveri qui porte le nom de Colh-ram, et dont l'embouchure est la plus septentrionale de celles du Caveri."—D'Anville, 115.

1761. "Clive dislodged a strong body of the Nabob's troops, who had taken post at Sameavarem, a fort and temple situated on the river Kalderon."—Complete H. of the War in India, from 1749 to 1761, (Tract) 1761, p. 12.

Columbo Root. Add:

1782. "Any person having a quantity of fresh sound Columbia Root to dispose of, will please direct a line."—India Gazette, Aug. 24.

1850. "Caoutchouc, or India-rubber, is found in abundance . . . (near Tette) . . . and calumba-root is plentiful. . . . The India-rubber is made into balls for a game resembling 'fives,' and calumba-root is said to be used as a mordant for certain colours, but not as a dye itself."—Livingstone, Expedition to the Zambesi, &c. p. 32.

Comboy. Add:

1615. "Tansho Samme, the Kinges kinsman, bought two pec. Cambaia cloth."—Cocks, i. 15.

Competition-wallah. Add:

1814. "Gungadthur Shastree is a person of great shrewdness and talent. . . . Though a very learned shastree he affects to be quite an Englishman, walks fast, talks fast, interrupts and contradicts, and calls the Peshwa and his ministers 'old fools' and . . . 'dam rascals.' He mixes English words with everything he says, and will say of some one (Holkar for instance): Bhot trickswalla tha, laiken barra abuklund, Kukhye tha."—Elphinstone in Life, i. 276.

Compound. The two first of the following quotations are important, carrying back the use of the word, as they do, to nearly a century before the earliest quotation previously known to us:

1679. (at Pollicull near Madapollam),

* "He was very tricky, but very sagacious, he was cock-eyed!"

"There the Dutch have a Factory of a large Compound, where they dye much blew cloth, having above 300 jars set in the ground for that work; also they make many of their best paintings there."—Fort St. Geo. Consns. (on Tour), April 14. In Notes and Extracts, Madras, 1871.

1696. "The 27th we began to unlade, and come to their custom-houses, of which there are three, in a square Compound of about 100 Faces over each way . . . The goods being brought and set in two Rows in the middle of the square are one by one opened before the Mandareens."—Mr. Bowyear's Journal at Cochín China, dated Foy-Foy, April 30. Dalb. Or. Rep. i. 79.

1848. "Lady O'Dowd, too, had gone to her bed in the nuptial chamber, on the ground floor, and had tucked her mosquito curtains round her fair form, when the guard at the gates of the commanding officer's compound beheld Major Dobbin, in the moonlight, rushing towards the house with a swift step."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 93.

The following shows the adoption of the word in West Africa:

1880. From West Afr. Mission, Port Lokkoh, Mr. A. Burchell writes: "Every evening we go out visiting and preaching the Gospel to our Timneh friends in their compounds."—Proceedings of C. M. Society for 1878-9, p. 14.

Compradore. Add before quotations:

"A new building was to be erected on the Bund at Shanghai, and Sir Thomas Wade was asked his opinion as to what style of architecture should be adopted. He at once said that for Shanghai, a great Chinese commercial centre, it ought to be Compradoric!"

1615. "I understand that yesterday the Hollanders cut a slave of theirs a-peeces for theft, per order of justice, and thrust their comprador (or cats buyer) out of dores for a lecherous knave. . . ."—Cocks, i. 19.

Congee. Add before quotations:

Congee is known to Horace, though reckoned, it would seem, so costly a remedy that the miser patient would as lief die as be plundered to the extent implied in its use:

. . . "Hunc medicus multum celer atque fidelis

Excitat hoc pacto . . .
. . . 'Agedum; sume hoc ptisanarium oryzae.'

'Quanti emptae?' 'Parvo.' 'Quanti ergo.' 'Octussibus.' 'Eheu!
Quid refert, morbo, an furtis pereamve rapinis?'"

Sat. II. iii. 147 seqq.

Also:

c. A.D. 70. (Indi) "maxime quidem oryza gaudent, ex qua tisanam conficiunt quam reliqui mortales ex hordeo."—Pliny, xviii. § 13.

Congeveram, n.p. An ancient and holy city of S. India, 46 m. S.W. of Madras. It is called Kachchi in Tamil literature, and Kachchipuram is probably represented by the modern name.

c. 1030. See Kanchi, in Al-Birûni, under Malabar.

1531. "Some of them said that the whole history of the Holy House (of St. Thomas) was written in the house of the Pagoda which is called Camjeverão, twenty leagues distant from the Holy House, of which I will tell you hereafter. . . ."—Correa, iii. 424.

1680. "Upon a report that Podela Lingapa had put a stop to all the Dutch business of Policat under his government, the agent sent Braminy says to Conjee Voram and to Policat."—Fort St. Geo. Cons. Aug. 30, in Notes and Extracts, No. III. 52.

Congo-bunder, or Cong, n.p. Kuny bandar; a port formerly of some consequence and trade, on the north shore of the Persian Gulf, about 100 m. west of Gombroon. The Portuguese had a factory here for a good many years after their expulsion from Ormus, and under treaty with Persia, made in 1625, had a right of pearl-fishery at Bahrein and a claim to half of the customs of Cong. These claims seem to have been gradually disregarded, and to have had no effect after about 1670, though the Portuguese would appear to have still kept up some pretext of monopoly of rights there in 1677 (see Chardin, ed. 1735, i. 348, and Bruce's Annals of the E. I. C., iii. 393).

Some confusion is created by the circumstance that there is another place on the same coast, nearly 2° further west, called Kongün, which possessed a good many vessels up to 1859, when it was destroyed by a neighbouring chief (see Stiffe's P. Gulf Pilot, 128). And this place is indicated by A. Hamilton (below) as the great mart for Bahrein pearls, a description which Fryer and others assign to what is evidently Cong.

1652. "Near to the place where the Euphrates falls from Balsara into the Sea, there is a little Island, where the Barques generally come to an Anchor. . . . There we stay'd four days, whence to Bandar-

Congo it is 14 days Sail. . . . This place would be a far better habitation for the Merchants than Ormus, where it is very unwholesom and dangerous to live. But that which hinders the Trade from Bandar-Congo is, because the Road to Lar is so bad . . . . The 30th, we hir'd a Vessel for Bander-Abassi, and after 3 or 4 hours Sailing we put into a Village . . . in the Island of Keckmishe (Kishm).—Tavernier, E. T., i. 94.

1653. "Congue est vne petite ville fort agreable sur le sein Persique à trois journées du Bandar Abbassi tirant à l'Ouest dominée par le Schah . . . les Portugais y ont vn Feitour (Factor) qui prend la moitié de la Douane, et donne la permission aux barques de naugier, en luy payant vn certain droit, parceque toutes ces mers sont tributaires de la generalité de Mascati, qui est à l'entrée du sein Persique . . . . Cette ville est peuplée d'Arabes, de Parsis et d'Indous qui ont leur Pagodes et leurs Saints hors la ville."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 284.

1677. "A Voyage to Congo for Pearl.—Two days after our Arrival at Gombroon, I went to Congo. . . . At Noon we came to Bassatu (see Bassadore), an old ruined Town of the Portugals, fronting Congo. . . . Congo is something better built than Gombroon, and has some small Advantage of the Air." (Then goes off about pearls).—Fryer, 320.

1683. "One Haggerston taken by ye said President into his Service, was run away with a considerable quantity of Gold and Pearle, to ye amount of 30,000 Rupees, intrusted to him at Bussera and Cong, to bring to Surrat, to save Freight and Custom."—Hedges, 96-97.

1685. "May 27.—This Afternoon it pleased God to bring us in safety to Cong Road. I went ashore immediately to Mr. Brough's house (Supra Cargo of ye Siam Merchant), and lay there all night."—Id. p. 202.

1727. "Congoum stands on the South side of a large River, and makes a pretty good figure in Trade; for most of the Pearl that are caught at Bareen, on the Arabian Side, are brought hither for a Market, and many fine Horses are sent thence to India, where they generally sell well. . . . The next maritim town, down the Gulf, is Cong, where the Portuguese lately had a Factory, but of no great Figure in Trade, tho' that Town has a small Trade with Banyans and Moors from India." (Here the first place is Kongum, the second one Kung).—A. Ham., i. 92-93.

Conicopoly. Add:

1680. "The Governour, accompanied with the Councill and severall Persons of the factory, attended by six files of Soldyers, the Company's Peons, 300 of the Washers, the Pedda Naigue, the Cancopoly of the Towne and of the grounds, went the circuit of Madras ground, which was described by the Cancopoly of the grounds, and lyes so intermixed with others (as is customary in these Countryes) that 'tis impossible to be knowne to any others, therefore every Village has a Cancopoly and a Parryar, who are employed in this office, which goes from Father to Son for ever."—Fort St. Geo, Consn. Sept. 21. In Notes and Extracts, No. 3, p. 34.

Consoo. Bp. Moule says, however: "The name is likely to have come from kung-su, the public hall, where a kung-sz, a 'public company,' or guild, meets.

Consumah.

c. 1664. "Some time after . . . she chose for her Kane-saman, that is, her Steward, a certain Persian called Nazerkan, who was a young Omrah, the handsomest and most accomplished of the whole Court."—Bernier, E. T., p. 4.

Cooch Azo. Add:

1753. "Ceste riviere (Brahmapoutra), en remontant, conduit à Rangamati et à Azoo, qui font la frontière de l'état du Mogol. Azoo est une forteresse que l'Emir Jemla, sous le règne d'Aorengzèbe, reprit sur le roi d'Asham, comme une dependance de Bengale."—D'Anville, p. 62.

Coolin, adj. A class of Brāhmans of Bengal Proper, who make extraordinary claims to purity of caste, and exclusiveness. Beng. Kulīnas, from Skt. kula, a caste or family, kulīna belonging to a noble family. They are much sought in marriage for the daughters of Brāhmans of less exalted pretensions, and often take many brides for the sake of the presents they receive. The system is one of the greatest abuses in Bengali Hinduism.

1820. "Some inferior Koolēsnūs marry many wives; I have heard of persons having 120; many have 15 or 20, and others 40 or 50 each. Numbers procure a subsistence by this excessive polygamy. . . ."—Ward, i. 81.

Coolung. Add:

c. 1809. "Large flocks of a crane called Kolong, and of another called Saros (Ardea Antigone—see Cyrus), frequent this district in winter. . . . They come from the north in the beginning of the cold season, and retire when the heats commence."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 579.

Coorsy. Add:

1781. "It happened, at this time, that the Nawaub was seated on his koorsy, or chair, in a garden, beneath a banyan tree."—H. of Hydur Naik, 452.

Corge. Add:

1747. "Another Sett of Madras Painters

... being examined regarding what Goods were Remaining in their hands upon the Loss of Madrass, they acknowledge to have had 15 Corge of Chints then under their Performance, and which they acquaint us is all safe . . . but as they have lost all their Wax and Colours, they request an Advance of 300 Pagodas for the Purchase of more. . . .—Consus. Fort St. David, Aug. 13. MS. Records in India Office.

Coromandel. Add at p. 199, after line 6 :

"by D'Anville (see Éclaircissements, p. 117) and by . . ."

Also at p. 200 : The statement of W. Hamilton is substantially correct. In the MS. "List of Persons in the Service of the Rt. Honble. E. I. Company in Fort St. George and other Places on the Coast of Choromandell," preserved in the India Office, that spelling continues down to 1778. In that year it is changed to Coromandel.

Corral. Add :

1404. "And this mosque and these chapels were very rich, and very finely wrought with gold and azure, and enamelled tiles (azulejos); and within there was a great corral, with trees and tanks of water."—Clavijo, § cv. Comp. Markham, 123.

Cosmin. Add :

1613. "The Portuguese proceeded without putting down their arms to attack the Banha Dela's (position), and destroyed it entirely, burning his factory and compelling him to flee to the kingdom of From, so that there now remained in the whole realm of Pegu only the Banho of Cosmim (a place adjoining Negrals) calling himself vassal of the King of Arracan."—Bocarro, 132.

Cospetir. Add :

1753. "Herodote fait aussi mention d'une ville de Caspatyrus située vers le haut du fleuve Indus, ce que Mercator a cru correspondre à une denomination qui existe dans la Géographie moderne, sans altération marquée, savoir Cospetir. La notion qu'on a de Cospetir se tire de l'historien Portugais Jean de Barros . . . la situation n'est plus celle qui convient à Caspatyrus."—D'Anville, 4-5.

Coss. Add :

1528. "I directed Chikmāk Beg, by a writing under the royal hand and seal, to measure the distance from Agra to Kābul; that at every nine kos he should raise a minār or turret, twelve gez in height, on the top of which he was to construct a pavilion." . . .—Barber, 393.

Cossack. Add :

1813. "By the bye, how do Clarke's friends the Cossacks, who seem to be a band of Circassians and other Sarmatians, come to be called by a name which seems to belong to a great Toorkee tribe on the banks of the Jaxartes? Kuzzauk is used about Delhi for a highwayman. Can it be (as I have heard) an Arabic Mobaligh (exaggeration) from kizk (plunder) applied to all predatory tribes?"—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 264.

1819. "Some dashing leader may . . . gather a predatory band round his standard, which, composed as it would be of desperate adventurers, and commanded by a professional Kuzzauk, might still give us an infinite deal of trouble."—Id., ii. 68.

Cossid. Add :

c. 1759. "For the performance of this arduous . . . duty, which required so much care and caution, intelligencers of talent, and Kasids or messengers, who from head to foot were eyes and ears . . . were stationed in every quarter of the country."—H. of Hydr. Nauk, 126.

Cossimbazar.

1665. "That evening I arrived at Casen-Basar, where I was welcom'd by Menheir Arnold van Wachtendonk, Director of all Holland-Factories in Bengal."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 56.

See also Bernier, E. T., p. 141.

Cossya. Add :

1790. "Agreed and ordered, that the Trade of Sylhet . . . be declared entirely free to all the natives . . . under the following Regulations :—1st. That they shall not supply the Cossyabs or other Hill-people with Arms, Ammunition or other articles of Military store. . . ."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 31.

Cot. Add :

1768-71. "We here found the body of the deceased, lying upon a kadel, or couch."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 442.

Cotamaluco, n. p. The title by which the Portuguese called the kings of the Golconda Dynasty, founded, like the other Mahomedan kingdoms of S. India, on the breaking up of the Bāhmāni kingdom of the Deccan. It was a corruption of Kutb-ul-Mulk, the designation of the founder, retained as the style of the dynasty by Mahomedans as well as Portuguese (see extract from Akbar Nāma under Idalcān).

1543. "When Idalcān heard this reply he was in great fear . . . and by night made his escape with some in whom he trusted (very few they were), and fled in secret, leaving his family and his wives, and went to the territories of the Izam Maluco (see Nizamaluco), his neighbour and friend . . . and made matrimonial ties with the Izam Maluco, marrying his daughter, on which they arranged together; and there also came into this concert the Madremaluco, and Cotamaluco, and the Verido, who are other great princes, marching with Izam Maluco, and connected with him by marriage."—Correa, iv. 313-314.

1553. "The Captains of the Kingdom of the Decan added to their proper names other honorary ones which they affected more, one calling himself Iniza Malmulco, which is as much as to say 'Spear of the State,' Cota Malmulco, i.e. 'Fortress of the State,' Adelchan, 'Lord of Justice'; and we, corrupting these names, call them Nizamaluco, Cotamaluco, and Hidalchan."—Barros, IV., iv. 16.

These same explanations are given by Garcia de Orta (Colloquios, f. 36 v), but of course the two first are quite wrong. Iniza Malmulco, as Barros here writes it, is Arabic An-Nizām ul Mulk, "The Administrator of the State," not from Pers. neza, "a spear." Cotamaluco is Kutb-ul-Mulk, Arabic, "the Pivot (or Pole-star) of the State," not from koṭa, "a fort," which is Hindi.

Cotton, s. We do not seem able to carry this familiar word further back than the Ar. kuṭn, kuṭun, or kuṭunn, having the same meaning, whence Prov. coton, Port. cotão, It. cotone, Germ. Kattun. The Sp. keeps the Ar. article, algodon, whence old Fr. auqueton and hoqueton, a coat quilted with cotton (see Meerzye). It is only by an odd coincidence that Pliny adduces a like-sounding word in his account of the arbores lanigeræ: "ferunt mali cotonei amplitudine cucurbitas, quæ maturitate ruptæ ostendunt lanuginis pilas, ex quibus vestes pretioso linteo faciunt" (xii. 10 (21)).

Counsillee, s. This is the title by which the natives in Calcutta generally designate English barristers. It is the same as the Irish one of Counsellor, and a corruption of that word.

Country. Add:

1747. "It is resolved and ordered that a Serjeant with two Troopers and a Party of Country Horse, to be sent to Markisnah Puram to patroll . . ."—Fort St. David Council of War, Dec. 25. MS. Records in India Office.

Course, s. The drive usually frequented by European gentlemen and ladies at an Indian station.

1583. "It was curious to Oakfield to be back on the Ferozepore course, after a six months' interval, which seemed like years. How much had happened in these six months!"—Oakfield, ii. 124.

Cowcolly. Add:

In Thornton's English Pilot, pt. iii. p. 7, of 1711, this place is called Cockoly.

Cowle. Add:

1680. "A Cowle granted by the Right Worshipful Streynsham Master, Esq., Agent and Governour for affairs of the Honorable East India Company in ffort St. George at Chinapatnam, by and with the advice of his Council to all the Pegu Ruby Marchants . . ."—Fort St. Geo. Cons. Feb. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. III. p. 10.

1758. "The Nawaub . . . having mounted some large guns on that hill . . . sent to the Killadar a Kowl-nama, or a summons and terms for his surrender."—H. of Hydrur Naik, 123.

Cowry. Add:

c. 1664. ". . . lastly, it (Indostan) wants those little Sea-cookles of the Maldives, which serve for common Coyn in Bengale, and in some other places . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 63.

1749. "The only Trade they deal in is Cowries (or Blackamoor's Teeth as they call them in England), the King's sole Property, which the sea throws up in great Abundance."—The Boscarens Voyage to Bombay, by Philalethes (1750), p. 52.

1791. "Notice is hereby given, that on or before the 1st November next, sealed proposals of Contract for the remittance in Dacca of the cowries received on account of the Revenues of Sylhet . . . will be received at the Office of the Secretary to the Board of Revenue . . . All persons who may deliver in proposals, are desired to specify the rates per cowa or covans of cowries (see kāhan at p. 208, b) at which they will engage to make the remittance proposed."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 53.

Cowtails. Add:

1665. "Now that this King of the Great Tibet knows, that Aureng-Zebe is at Kachemire, and threatens him with War, he hath sent to him an Ambassador, with Presents of the Countrey, as Chryystal, and those dear White Cow-tails . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 135.

Cranny.

It is curious to find this word explained by an old French writer, in almost the modern application to East Indians. This shows that the word was used at Goa in something of its Hindu sense of one of mixt blood.

1653. "Les karanes sont engendrez d'un Mestis, et d'une Indienne, lesquels sont oiaustres. Ce mot de Karanes vient à mon avis de Kara, qui signifie en Turq la terre, ou bien la couleur noire, comme si l'on vouloit dire par Karanes les enfans du pais, ou bien les noirs: ils ont les memes avantages dans leur professions que les autres Mestis."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 226.

Compare in M. Polo, Bk. I., ch. 18, his statement about the Caraoas, and note thereon.

Crease, Cris. Add:

It is curious to find the cris adopted by Alboquerque as a piece of state costume. When he received the ambassadors of Shoiikh Ismael, i.e. the Shah of Persia, Ismael Sâfi, at Ormuz, we read:

1515. "For their reception there was prepared a dais of three steps . . . which was covered with carpets, and the Governor seated thereon in a decorated chair, arrayed in a tunic and surcoat of black damask, with his collar, and his golden cris, as I described before, and with his big, long snow-white beard; and at the back of the dais the captains and gentlemen, handsomely attired, with their swords girt, and behind them their pages with lances and targets, and all uncovered."—Correa, ii. 423.

The portrait of Alboquerque in the 1st vol. of Mr. Birch's Translation of the Commentaries, realises the snow-white beard, tunic, and black surcoat, but the cris is missing.

Creole. Add:

Criados, criados, according to P'yrrard de Laval, were used at Goa for male and female servants. And see the passage from Correa quoted under Neelam in SUPPT., where the words 'apparel and servants' are in the original 'todo o futo e criados.'

1782. "Mr. Macintosh being the son of a Scotch Planter by a French Creole, of one of the West India Islands, is as swarthy and ill-looking a man as is to be seen on the Portuguese Walk on the Royal Exchange."—Price's Observations, &c., p. 9, in Price's Tracts, i.

Cubebs. Add after quotation from Pegolotti:

"Cubebs are of two kinds, i.e. domestic and wild, and both should be entire and light, and of good smell; and the domestic are known from the wild in this way, that the former are a little more brown than the wild; also the domestic are round, whilst the wild have the lower part a little flattened underneath like flattened buttons."—Ibid. in orig. 374-5.

Cucuyada. Add:

1525. "On this immediately some of his Nairs who accompanied him, desired to smite the Portuguese who were going through the streets; but the Regedor would not permit it; and the Caimal approaching the King's palace, without entering to speak to the King, ordered those cries of theirs to be made which they call cucuyadas, and in a few minutes there gathered together more than 2000 Nairs with their arms . . ."—Correa, ii. 926.

1543. "At the house of the pagod there was a high enclosure-wall of stone, where the Governor collected all his people, and those of the country came trooping with bows and arrows and a few matchlocks, raising great cries and cucuyadas, such as they employ to call each other to war, just like cranes when they are going to take wing."—Id. iv. 327.

Cuddapah. Add:

1768. "The chiefs of Shanoor and Kirpa also followed the same path."—H. of Hydr Naik, 189.

Cuddy. Add:

1848. "The youngsters among the passengers, young Chaffers of the 150th, and poor little Ricketts, coming home after his third fever, used to draw out Sedley at the cuddy-table, and make him tell prodigious stories about himself and his exploits against tigers and Napoleon."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, ii. 255.

Culgee. Add:

c. 1514. "In this manner the people of Bārān catch great numbers of herons. The Kilki-saj* are of the heron's feathers."—Barber, 154.

1759. "To present to Omed Roy, viz.:—
1 Culghah . . . 1200 0 0
1 Surpage (sirpesh, or aigrette). . . 600 0 0
1 Killot (see Killut) . . . 250 0 0" —Expenses of Nabob's Entertainment. In Lough, 193.

Cumshaw. Add:

Bp. Moule suggests that this may be Kan-siu (or Cantonese) Kām-sau, 'thank-gift.'

Curnum. Add:

1827. "Very little care has been taken to preserve the survey accounts. Those of several villages are not to be found. Of the remainder only a small share is in the Collector's cutcherry, and the rest is in the hands of curnums, written on cadjans."—Minute by Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 285.

Currumshaw Hills, n.p. This name appears in Rennell's Bengal Atlas, applied to hills in the Gaya district. It is ingeniously supposed by F. Buchanan to have been a mistake of the geographer's, in taking "Plumes worn on the cap or turban on great occasions." Also see Punjab Trade Report, App., p. ccxv.

Karna-Chaupār ('Karna's place of meeting or teaching'), the name of an ancient ruin on the hills in question, for Karnachau Pahār (Pahār=Hill).—Eastern India, i. 4.

Curry. The date of the quotation from Correa, respecting Vasco de Gama, refers to A.D. 1502.

Cuscuss. Add:

1663. "... having in lieu of Cellarage certain kas-kanays, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Roots, that are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre near some conservatory, that so the servants may easily, with their Pompion-bottles, water them from without."—Bernier, E. T., 79.

In the sense of poppy-seed, this word is Persian (De Orta says Arabic):

1563. "... at Cambaïete, seeing in the market that they were selling poppy-heads big enough to fill a canada, and also some no bigger than ours, and asking the name, I was told that it was caxax (cashcash)—and that in fact is the name in Arabic—and they told me that of these poppies was made opium (amfiāo), cuts being made in the poppy-head, so that the opium exudes."—Garcia De Orta, f. 155.

1621. "The 24th of April public proclamation was made in Ispahan by the King's order . . . that, on pain of death, no one should drink cocnur, which is a liquor made from the husk of the capsule of opium, called by them khash-khash."—P. della Valle, ii. 209.

Cuspadore. Add:

1672. "Here maintain themselves three of the most powerful lords and Naiks of this kingdom, who are subject to the Crown of Velour, and pay it tribute of many hundred Pagodas . . . viz. Vitipa-naik of Madura, the King's Cuspidoor-bearer, 200 Pagodas, Cristapa naik of Chengier, the King's Betel-server, 200 pagodas, the Naik of Tanjouwer, the King's Warder and Umbrella carrier, 400 Pagodas . . ."—Baldacius, Germ. ed. 153.

Custard-apple. Add:

This is called in Chinese Fan-li-chi, i.e. foreign leeches (q.v.).

Custom. Add:

1683. "Threder and Barker positively denied ye overweight, ye Merchants proved it by their books; but ye skeyne out of every draught was confest, and claimed as their due, having been always the custom."—Hedges, Hak. Soc. 83.

1768-71. "Banyans, who . . . serve in this capacity without any fixed pay, but they know how much more they may charge upon every rupee, than they have in reality paid, and this is called costumado."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 522.

Cuttanee. The use of this word, quoted under Alleja, shows that it was a silk stuff.

Cyrus. Add:

1840. "Bands of gobbling pelicans" (see this word, probably adjutants are meant) "and groups of tall cyrruses in their half-Quaker, half-lancer plumage, consulted and conferred together, in seeming perplexity as to the nature of our intentions."—Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 108.

D.

Dacca. Add:

Dāka is throughout Central Asia applied to all muslins imported through Kabul.

1665. "Daca is a great Town, that extends itself only in length."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 55.

Dadney. Add:

1748. "The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillick Chund, Gosserain, Occore, and Otteram, they being of a different caste, and consequently they could not do business with them, upon which they refused Dadney, and having the same objection to make this year, they propose taking their shares of the Dadney."—Ft. William Cons., May 23. In Long, p. 9.

Daimio, s. A feudal prince in Japan. The word appears to be approximately the Jap. pronunciation of Chin. tai-ming, 'great name.'

Dalaway. Add:

There is also a Hind. word dal for a great army.

c. 1747. "A few days after this, the Dulwai sent for Hydur, and seating him on a musnud with himself, he consulted with him on the re-establishment of his own affairs, complaining bitterly of his distress for want of money."—H. of Hydur Naik, 44.

See also Dalwai in quotation under Dhurna, in SUPPT.

Dam. Add:

c. 1840. "Charles Greville saw the Duke soon after, and expressing the pleasure he had felt in reading his speech (commending the conduct of Capt. Charles Elliot in China), added that, however, many of the party were angry with it; to which the Duke replied, "I know they are, and I don't care a damn. I have no time to do what is right."

"A twopenny damn was, I believe, the form usually employed by the Duke, as an expression of value: but on the present occasion he seems to have been less precise."—Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor, i. 296.

The term referred to seems curiously to preserve an unconscious tradition of the pecuniary, or what the idiomatic jargon of our time calls the 'monetary,' estimation contained in this expression.

Dammer. Add:

1885. "The other great industry of the place (in Sumatra) is dammar collecting. This substance, as is well known, is the resin which exudes from notches made in various species of coniferous and dipterocarpaceous trees . . . out of whose stem . . . the native cuts large notches up to a height of 40 or 50 feet from the ground. The tree is then left for 3 or 4 months, when, if it be a very healthy one, sufficient dammar will have exuded to make it worth collecting; the yield may then be as much as 94 Amsterdam pounds."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 135.

Dangur, n. p. H. Dhāngar, the name by which members of various tribes of Chūtā Nāgpur, but especially of the Orāons, are generally known when they go out to distant provinces to seek employment as labourers ("coolies"). A very large proportion of those who emigrate to the tea-plantations of Eastern India, and also to Mauritius and other colonies, belong to the Orāon tribe. The etymology of the term Dhāngar is doubtful. The late Gen. Dalton says: "Amongst several tribes of the Tributary Mahāls, the terms Dhāngar and Dhāngarin mean the youth of the two sexes, both in highland and lowland villages, and it cannot be considered as the national designation of any particular tribe" (Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal, 245).

Darcheennee, s. P. dār-chīnī, 'China stick,' i.e., cinnamon.

1563. "... The people of Ormuz, because this bark was brought for sale there by those who had come from China, called it dar-chini, which in Persian means 'wood of China,' and so they sold it in Alexandria. . . ."—Garcia, f. 59-60.

1621. "As for cinnamon which you wrote was called by the Arabs dartzeni, I assure you that the dar-sint as the Arabs say, or dar-chini as the Persians and Turks call it, is nothing but our ordinary canella."—F. della Valle, ii. 206-7.

Daroga. Add:

The Byzantine form quoted in GLOSS., and the two following passages, seem to imply some former variation in pronunciation. But Clavijo has also derroga in § clii.

1404. "And in this city (Tauris) there was a kinsman of the Emperor as Magistrate thereof, whom they call Derrega, and he treated the said Ambassadors with much respect."—Clavijo, § lxxxii. Comp. Markham, 90.

1665. "There stands a Derega, upon each side of the River, who will not suffer any person to pass without leave."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 52.

Datchin. Add:

Favre's Malay Dict. gives (in French) "daxing (Ch. pa-tchen), steel-yard, balance," also "ber-daxing, to weigh," and Javan. "daxin, a weight of 100 kātis." Gericke's Javan. Dict. also gives "datsin-Picol," with a reference to Chinese.

Datura. Add:

c. 1580. "Nascitur et . . . Datura Indorum, quarum ex seminibus Latrones bellaria parant, quae in caravanis mercatoribus exhibentes largumque somnum, profundumque inducentes aurum gemmasque surripiunt et abeunt."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. I., pp. 190-191.

Dawk.

1528. "... that every ten kos he should erect a nam, or post-house, which they call a dāk-choki, for six horses . . ."—Baber, 393.

Daye. Add:

1782. In a Table of monthly Wages at Calcutta, we have:—

"Dy (Wet-nurse) 10 Rs."

India Gazette, Oct. 12.

Delhi. Add:

According to Panjab Notes and Queries, Dilpat is traditionally the name of the Dill of Prithvī Rāj. Dil is an old Hindi word for an eminence; and this is probably the etymology of Dilpat or Dilli (op. cit. ii. 117-118).

We have quoted in the Glossary (p. 234, b) one passage from Correa concerning the Empire of Delhi, but we may add another which curiously illustrates the looseness of his geography:

"This Kingdom of Dely is the greatest that is to be seen in those parts, for one point that it holds is in Persia, and the other is in contact with the Loochoos (or Lequios) beyond China."—iii. 572.

Delly, Mount. Add:

1759. "We are further to remark that the late troubles at Tellicherry, which proved almost fatal to that settlement, took rise from a dispute with our linguist and the Prince of that Country, relative to lands he, the linguist, held at Mount Dilly."—Court's Letter of March 23. In Long, 198.

Deloll. Add:

1754. "Mr. Baillie at Jugdea, accused by these villains, our dulols, who carried on for a long time their most flagrant rascality. The Dulols at Jugdea found to charge the Company 15 per cent. beyond the price of the goods."—Fort Wm. Cons. In Long, p. 50.

Demijohn. Add, after reference to 'Dozy (Supp. aux Dict. Arabes)':

It may be noticed, as worthy of further enquiry, that Sir T. Herbert speaks of the abundance and cheapness of wine at Damaghān (192).

Dengue, s. The name applied to a kind of fever. The term is of West Indian, not East Indian, origin, and has only become known and familiar in India within the last 15 or 18 years. The origin of the name which seems to be generally accepted is, that owing to the stiff unbending carriage which this fever induced in those who suffered from it, the negroes in the W. Indies gave it the name of 'dandy fever'; and this name, taken up by the Spaniards, was converted into dengy or dengue.

Some of its usual characteristics are the great suddenness of attack; often a red eruption; pain amounting sometimes to anguish in head and back, and shifting pains in the joints; excessive and sudden prostration; after-pains of rheumatic character. Its epidemic occurrences are generally at long intervals.

Omitting such occurrences in America and in Egypt, symptoms attach to an epidemic on the Coromandel coast about 1780 which point to this disease; and in 1824 an epidemic of the kind caused much alarm and suffering in Calcutta, Berhampore, and other places in India. This had no repetition of equal severity in that quarter till 1871-72, though there had been a minor visitation in 1853, and a succession of cases in 1868-69. In 1872 it was so prevalent in Calcutta that among those in the service of the E. I. Railway Company, European and native, prior to August in that year, 70 per cent. had suffered from the disease; and whole households were sometimes attacked at once. It became endemic in Lower Bengal for several seasons.

When the present writer left India (in 1862) the name dengue may have been known to medical men, but it was quite unknown to the lay European public.

THE CONTAGION OF DENGUE FEVER.

"In a recent issue (March 14th, p. 551), under the heading 'Dengue Fever in New Caledonia,' you remark that, although there had been upwards of nine hundred cases, yet, 'curiously enough,' there had not been one death. May I venture to say that the 'curiosity' would have been much greater had there been a death? For, although this disease is one of the most infectious, and, as I can testify from unpleasant personal experience, one of the most painful that there is, yet death is a very rare occurrence. In an epidemic at Bermuda in 1882, in which about five hundred cases came under my observation, not one death was recorded. In that epidemic, which attacked both whites and blacks impartially, inflammation of the cellular tissue, affecting chiefly the face, neck, and scrotum, was especially prevalent as a sequela, none but the lightest cases escaping. I am not aware that this is noted in the text-books as a characteristic of the disease; in fact, the descriptions in the books then available to me, differed greatly from the disease as I then found it, and I believe that was the experience of other medical officers at the time.

* * *

"During the epidemic of dengue above mentioned, an officer who was confined to his quarters, convalescing from the disease, wrote a letter home to his father in England. About three days after the receipt of the letter, that gentleman complained of being ill, and eventually, from his description, had a rather severe attack of what, had he been in Bermuda, would have been called dengue fever. As it was, his medical attendant was puzzled to give a name to it. The disease did not spread to the other members of the family, and the patient made a good recovery.—Henry J. Barnes, Surgeon, Medical Staff, Fort Pitt, Chat-ham." From British Medical Journal, April 25th.

Deuti, s. H. dūtī, from Skt. dīpa, 'a lamp,' a lamp-stand, but also a link-bearer.

c. 1526. (In Hindustan) "instead of a candle or torch, you have a gang of dirty fellows whom they call Deutīs, who hold in their hand a kind of small tripod, to the side of one leg of which . . . they fasten a pliant wick. . . . In their right hand they hold a gourd . . . and whenever the wick requires oil, they supply it from this gourd. . . . If their emperors or chief nobility at any time have occasion for a light by night, these filthy Deūtis bring in their lamp . . . and there stand holding it close by his side."—Baber, 333.

1681. "Six men for Dutys, Rundell (see Roundel), and Kittesole (see Kittysoll)."—List of Servants allowed at Madapollam Factory. Fl. St. George Cons., Jan. 8. In Notes and Extracts, No. II., p. 72.

Devadāsī. Add:

c. 1790. "La principale occupation des devedashies, est de danser devant l'image de la divinité qu'elles servent, et de chanter ses louanges, soit dans son temple, soit dans les rues, lorsqu'on porte l'idole dans des processions . . ."—Haafner, ii. 105.

Devil, s. A petty whirlwind, or circular storm, is often so called. See Pisachee, Shaitan, Typhoon.

Devil-bird, s. This is a name used in Ceylon for a bird believed to be kind of owl,—according to Haeckel, quoted below, the Syrnium Indrani of Sykes, or Brown Wood Owl of Jerdon. Mr. Mitford, quoted below, however, believes it to be a Podargus, or Night-hawk.

c. 1328. "Quid dicam? Diabolus ibi etiam loquitur, saepe et saepius, hominibus, nocturnis temporibus, sicut ego audivi."—Jordani Mirabilia, in Rec. de Voyages, iv. 53.

1681. "This for certain I can affirm, That oftentimes the Devil doth cry with an audible Voice in the Night; 'tis very shrill, almost like the barking of a Dog. This I have often heard myself; but never heard that he did anybody any harm. . . . To believe that this is the Voice of the Devil these reasons urge, because there is no Creature known to the Inhabitants, that cry like it, and because it will on a sudden depart from one place, and make a noise in another, quicker than any fowl could fly; and because the very Dogs will tremble and shake when they hear it."—Knock's Ceylon, 78.

1849. "Devil's Bird (Strix Gaulama or Ulama, Singh.). A species of owl. The wild and wailing cry of this bird is considered a sure presage of death and misfortune, unless measures be taken to avert its infernal threats, and refuse its warning. Though often heard even on the tops of their houses, the natives maintain that it has never been caught or distinctly seen, and they consider it to be one of the most annoying of the evil spirits which haunt their country."—Fridham's Ceylon, p. 737-8.

1860. "The Devil-Bird is not an owl. its ordinary note is a magnificent clear shout like that of a human being, and which can be heard at a great distance. It has another cry like that of a hen just caught, but the sounds which have earned for it its bad name . . . are indescribable, the most appalling that can be imagined, and scarcely to be heard without shuddering; I can only compare it to a boy in torture, whose screams are being stopped by being strangled."—Mr. Mitford's Note, in Tennent's Ceylon, i. 167.

1881. "The uncanny cry of the devil-bird, Syrnium Indrani. . . ."—Haeckel's Visit to Ceylon, 235.

Devil's Reach, n.p. This was the old name of a reach on the Hoogly R. a little way above Pulta (and about 15 miles above Calcutta). On that reach are several groups of devāls, or idol-temples, which probably gave the name.

1684. "August 28.—I borrowed the late Dutch Fiscal's Budgero, and went in Company with Mr. Beard, Mr. Littleton" (etc.) "as far as y<sup>e</sup> Devill's Reach, where I caused y<sup>e</sup> tents to be pitched in expectation of y<sup>e</sup> Presidents arrivall and lay here all night."—Hedges, p. 156.

1711. "From the lower Point of Devil's Reach you must keep mid-channel, or nearest the Starboard Shore, for the Larboard is shoal until you come into the beginning of Pulta or Poutto Reach, and there abreast of a single great Tree, you must edge over to the East Shore below Pulta."—The English Pilot, 54.

Dewaun. Add, in p. 240, col. 1:

1762. "A letter from Dacca states that the Hon'ble Company's Dewan (Manikchand) died on the morning of this letter. . . . And as they apprehend he has died worth a large sum of money which the Government's people (i.e. of the Nawab) may be desirous to possess to the injury of his lawful heirs, they request the protection of the flag . . . to the family of a man who has served the Company for upwards of 30 years with care and fidelity."—Fl. Wm. Cosma, Nov. 29. In Long, 283.

Dhall. It should have been made clearer that dāl is not the name of a particular pea, but the generic name of pulses prepared for use by being broken in a hand-mill; though the peas named are those commonly used in Upper India in this way.

Dhooly. Add, after reference to Herklots:

Polī is from ḍolnā, 'to swing.' The word is also applied to the meat- (or milk-) safe, which is usually slung to a tree.

And at the end of the large-type matter:

Dāla occurs in Ibn Batuta, but the translators render 'palankin,' and do not notice the word:

c. 1343. "The principal vehicle of the people (of Malabar) is a dūla, carried on the shoulders of slaves or hired men. Those who do not ride in a dūla, whoever they may be, go on foot."—Ibn Bat., iv. 73.

c. 1768. "... leaving all his wounded ... on the field of battle, telling them to be of good cheer, for that he would send Doolies for them from Astara. ..."—H. of Hydr Naik, 226.

Dhoon. Add:

1526. "In the language of Hindustān they call a Jālga (or dale) Dūn. The finest running water in Hindustān is that in this Dūn."—Baber, 299.

Dhow. Add:

1844. "I left the hospitable village of Takaungu in a small boat, called a 'Daw' by the Suahilis ... the smallest sea-going vessel."—Krapp, p. 117.

1883. "Dhau is a large vessel which is falling into disuse. ... Their origin is in the Red Sea. The word is used vaguely, and is applied to baghlas." See Buggalow—Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. 717-718.

Dhurna. Add:

It appears from Elphinstone, below, that the custom was also known as takāzā, i.e. 'importunity.'

c. 1747. "While Nundi Raj, the Dulwai (see Dalaway), was encamped at Sutti Mangul, his troops, for want of their pay, placed him in Dhurna."

"... Hurree Singh, forgetting the ties of salt, or gratitude to his master, in order to obtain his arrears of pay, forbade the sleeping and eating of the Dulwai, by placing him in Dhurna ... and that in so great a degree as even to stop the water used in his kitchen. The Dulwai, losing heart from this rigour, with his clothes and the vessels of silver and gold used in travelling, and a small sum of money, paid him off and discharged him."—H. of Hydr Naik, 41-42.

In the book next quoted there are frequent examples of the dharnā process in the camp of Sindia. On one occasion the chief himself puts it in operation:

1808. "A remarkable circumstance took place yesterday. Some Sirdars put the Maharaja (Sindia) in dhurna. He was angry, and threatened to put them to death. Bhugwunt Ras Bye, their head, said, 'Sit still; put us to death.' Sindia was enraged, and ordered him to be paid and driven from camp. He refused to go. ... The bazaars were shut the whole day; troops were posted to guard them and defend the tents ... At last the mutineers marched off, and all was settled."—Elphinstone's Diary, in Life, i. 179-180.

1809. "Seendhiya (i.e. Sindia), who has been lately plagued by repeated D'hurnas, seems now resolved to partake also in the active part of the amusement: he had permitted this same Patunkur, as a signal mark of favour, to borrow 50,000 rupees from the Khasgee, or private treasury. ... The time elapsed without the agreement having been fulfilled; and Seendhiya immediately dispatched the treasurer to sit D'hurna on his behalf at Patunkur's tents."—Broughton's Letters from a Mahratta Camp, 169-170.

1819. "It is this which is called takāzā * by the Mahrattas. ... If a man have a demand from (? upon) his inferior or equal, he places him under restraint, prevents his leaving his house or eating, and even compels him to sit in the sun until he comes to some accommodation. If the debtor were a superior, the creditor had first recourse to supplications and appeals to the honour and sense of shame of the other party; he laid himself on his threshold, threw himself in his road, clamoured before his door, or he employed others to do this for him; he would even sit down and fast before the debtor's door, during which time the other was compelled to fast also; or he would appeal to the gods, and invoke their curses upon the person by whom he was injured."—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 87.

1885. "One of the most curious practices in India is that still followed in the native states by a Brahman creditor to compel payment of his debt, and called in Hindi dharnā, and in Sanskrit ācharita, 'customary proceeding,' or Prāyopaveśana, 'sitting down to die by hunger.' This procedure has long since been identified with the practice of 'fasting upon' (troscud for) a debtor to God or man, which is so frequently mentioned in the Irish so-called Brehon Laws. ... In a MS. in the Bodleian ... there is a Middle-Irish legend which tells how St. Patrick 'fasted upon' Loegaire, the unbelieving over-king of Ireland. Loegaire's pious queen declares that she will not eat anything while Patrick is fasting. Her son Enna seeks for food. 'It is not fitting for thee,' says his mother, 'to eat food whilst Patrick is fasting upon you.' ... It would seem from this story that in Ireland the wife and children of the debtor, and, a fortiori, the debtor himself, had to fast so long as the creditor fasted."—Letter from Mr. Whitley Stokes, in Academy, Sept. 12th.

Diamond Harbour, n. p. An anchorage in the Hoogly below Calcutta, 30 m. by road and 41 by river. It was the usual anchorage of the old Indiamen in the mercantile days of the E. I. Company. In the oldest charts we find the "Diamond Sand," on the western side of what is now called Diamond Harbour, and on some later charts, Diamond Point.

1683. "We anchored this night on ye head of ye Diamond Sand."

"Jan. 26. This morning early we weighed anchor . . . but got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island" (Kedgerree).—Hedge's Diary, Hak. Soc. 64. See also under Rogue's River in SUPPL.

* Ar. takāzā, dunning or importunity.

Didwan (?), s. This term occurs several times in the Madras printed Notes and Extracts, e.g., in quotations under Tripticane in GLOSSARY, under Aumildar, and under Juncameer, in SUPPL. There is a Persian word, didbān, 'a look-out,' 'watchman or guard, but we have not elsewhere met with this in Indian technical use, and the quotations rather suggest a corruption of Diwan.

Diul-Sind. Add:

1753. "Celui (le bras du Sind) de la droite, après avoir passé à Fairuz, distant de Mansora de trois journées selon Edrisi, se rend à Debil ou Diyl, au quel nom on ajoute quelque fois celui de Sindi. . . La ville est située sur une langue de terre en forme de péninsule, d'où je pense que lui vient son nom actuel de Diul ou Diyl, formé du mot Indien Div, qui signifie une île. D'Herbelot . . . la confond avec Diu, dont la situation est à l'entrée du Golfe de Cambaye."—D'Anville, p. 40.

Doai! Add:

"Until 1860 no one dared to ignore the appeal of dohāi to a native Prince within his territory. I have heard a serious charge made against a person for calling the dohai needlessly" (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

Doombur, s. The name commonly given in India to the fat-tailed sheep, breeds of which are spread over Western Asia and Eastern Africa. The word is properly (Pers.) dunba, 'tail,' or especially this fat tail.

The old story of little carts being attached to the quarters of these sheep to bear their tails is found in many books, but it is difficult to trace any modern evidence of the fact. We quote some passages bearing on it:

c. A.D. 250. "The tails of the sheep (of India) reach to their feet. . . The shepherds . . . cut open the tails and take out the tallow, and then sew it up again. . ."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. iv. 32.

1298. "Then there are sheep here as big as asses; and their tails are so large and fat, that one tail shall weigh some 30 lbs. They are fine fat beasts, and afford capital mutton."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 18.

1436. "Their iijth kinde of beasts are sheepe, which be unreasonable great, longe legged, longe woll, and great tayles, that waie about xijl. a piece. And some such I have seene as have drawn a wheele afte them, their tails being holden vp."—Jos. Barbaro, Hak. Soc., 21.

c. 1520. "These sheep are not different from others, except as regards the tail, which is very large, and the fatter the sheep is the bigger is his tail. Some of them have tails weighing 10 and 20 pounds, and that will happen when they get fat of their own accord. But in Egypt many people make a business of fattening sheep, and feed them on bran and wheat, and then the tail gets so big that the sheep can't stir. But those who keep them tie the tail on a kind of little cart, and in this way they move about. I saw one sheep's tail of this kind at Asiot, a city of Egypt 150 miles from Cairo, on the Nile, which weighed 80 lbs., and many people asserted to me that they had seen such tails that weighed 150 lbs."—Leo Africanus, in Ramusio, i., f. 92 v.

1828. "We had a Doomba ram at Prag. The Doomba sheep are difficult to keep alive in this climate."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 28.

1846. "I was informed by a person who possessed large flocks, and who had no reason to deceive me, that sometimes the tail of the Tymunnee doombas increased to such a size, that a cart or small truck on wheels was necessary to support the weight, and that without it the animal could not wander about; he declared also that he had produced tails in his flock which weighed 12 Tabreezi munds, or 48 seers puckah, equal to about 96 lbs."—Captain Hutton, in Jour. As. Soc. Beng., xv. 160.

Doray. Add:

1680. "The delivery of three Iron guns to the Deura of Ramacole at the rate of 15 Pagodas per candy is ordered. . . which is much more than what they cost."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Aug. 5. In Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 31.

1882. "The appellation by which Sir T. Munro was most commonly known in the Ceded Districts was that of 'Colonel Dora.' And to this day it is considered a sufficient answer to inquiries regarding the reason for any Revenue Rule, that it was laid down by the Colonel Dora."—Arbuthnot's Memoir of Sir T. M., p. xcvi.

"A village up the Godavery, on the left bank, is inhabited by a race of people known as Doraylu, or 'gentlemen.' That this is the understood meaning is shown by the fact that their women are called Doresandlu, i.e. 'ladies.' These people rifle their arrow feathers, i.e. give them a spiral." (Reference lost.)

Dosooty, s. H. do-sūtī and do-sūtā, "double-thread," a kind of cheap cotton stuff woven with threads doubled.

Double-grill, s. Domestic Hind. of the kitchen for 'a devil' in the culinary sense.

Dour, s. A foray, or a hasty expedition of any kind. Hind. daur, 'a run.' Also to dour, to run, or to make such an expedition.

1853. "'Halloa! Oakfield,' cried Perkins, as he entered the mess tent . . . 'don't look down in the mouth, man; Attok taken, Chutter Sing dauring down like the devil—march to-morrow. . . .'"—Oakfield, ii. 67.

Dowra, s. A guide. Hind. daurāhā, daurahā, and daurā, 'a village runner, a guide,' from daurṇā, 'to run' (Skt. dhora).

1827. "The vidette, on his part, kept a watchful eye on the Dowrah, a guide supplied at the last village."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

Dravida.

See Dravira in a quotation from Al-Birūnī under Malabar.

Druggerman. Add:

c. 1150? "Quorum lingua cum prænominato Iohanni, Indorum patriarchæ, nimis esset obscura, quod neque ipse quod Romani dicerent, neque Romani quod ipse diceret intelligerent, interprete interposito, quem Achivi drogomanum vocant, de mutuo statu Romanorum et Indicæ regionis ad invicem querere coeperunt."—De Adventu Patriarchæ Indorum, printed in Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, i. 12. Leipzig, 1879.

1585. "... e dopo m'esservi prouisto di vn buonissimo dragomano, et interprete, fu inteso il suono delle trombette le quali annuntiaano l'udienza del Rè" (di Pegh).—Gasparo Balbi, f. 102 v.

Drumstick. Add:

c. 1790. "Mon domestique étoit occupé à me préparer un plat de morungas, qui sont une espèce de fèves longues, auxquelles les Européens ont donné, à cause de leur forme, le nom de baguettes à tambour. . ."—Haafner, ii. 25.

Dub. Add:

c. 1790. "J'eus pour quatre dabous, qui font environ cinq sous de France, d'excellent poisson pour notre souper."—Haafner, ii. 75.

Duck. Add:

1803. "I think they manage it here famously. They have neither the comforts of a Bengal army, nor do they rough it, like the Ducks."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 53.

Dumdum. Add:

1848. "'Pooh! nonsense,' said Joe, highly flattered. 'I recollect, sir, there was a girl at Dumdum, a daughter of Cutler of the Artillery . . . who made a dead set at me in the year '4.'"—Vanity Fair, i. 25, ed. 1867.

Durbar. Add:

"In Kattywar, by a curious idiom, the chief himself is so addressed: 'Yes, Durbar;' no, Durbar,' being common replies to him" (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

Durian. Add:

1835. "I proceeded . . . under a continuous shade of tall Durian trees from 35 to 40 feet high . . . In the flowering time it was a most pleasant shady wood; but later in the season the chance of a fruit now and then descending on one's head would be less agreeable."

Durjun, s. H. darjan, a corr. of the English dozen.

Durwauza-bund. The formula by which a native servant in an Anglo-Indian household intimates that his master or mistress cannot receive a visitor—"Not at home,"—without the untruth. It is elliptical for darwāza bund hai, 'the door is closed.'

Dustoor. Add:

1680. "It is also ordered that in future the Vakils, Mutsuddes, or Writers of the Tagadgers,† Dunniers (?), or overseers of the Weavers, and the Picars and Podars (see these in SUPPT.) shall not receive any monthly wages, but shall be content with the Dustoor . . . of a quarter anna in the rupee, which the merchants and weavers are to allow them. The Dustoor may be divided twice a year or oftener by the Chief and Council among the said employers."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Dec. 2. In Notes and Extracts, No. II. p. 61.

1681. "For the farme of Dustoor on cooley hire at Pagodas 20 per annum received a part . . . (Pag.) 13 00 0."—Do. Jan. 10, Id. No. III. p. 45.

Dustuck. See under Writer, quotation of 1762; also in SUPPT. under Hosbolhookum.

* "Of this fruit the natives are passionately fond; and Mr. Wallace writes it is worth a voyage to the East to taste; and the elephants flock to its shade in the fruiting time; but, more singular still, the tiger is said to devour it with avidity."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 240.

† Tagadagur, under the Maharrattas, was an officer who enforced the state demands against defaulting cultivators (Wabon); and no doubt it was here an officer similarly employed to enforce the execution of contracts by weavers and others who had received advances. It is a corruption of Pers. tahā-agir, from Ar. takāza, importunity (see quotation of 1819, under Dhurna).

E.

Eed. Add:

1860. "By the Nazim's invitation we took out a party to the palace at the Bakri Eed (or Feast of the Goat), in memory of the sacrifice of Isaac, or, as the Moslems say, of Ishmael."—Storms and Sunshine, &c., ii. 255-6. See as to the goat, art. in GLOSS.

1869. "Il n'y a proprement que deux fêtes parmi les Musulmans sunnites, celle de la rupture du jeûne de Ramazan, 'Id fito, et celle des victimes 'Id curbân, nommée aussi dans l'Inde Bacr 'Id, fête du Taureau, ou simplement 'Id, la fête par excellence, laquelle est établie en mémoire du sacrifice d'Ismâel."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. dans l'Inde, 9-10.

Ekteng, adj. The native representation of the official designation 'acting' applied to a substitute, especially in the Civil Service. The manner in which the natives used to explain the expression to themselves is shown in the quotation.

1883. "Lawrence had been only 'acting' there; a term which has suggested to the minds of the natives, in accordance with their pronunciation of it, and with that striving after meaning in syllables which leads to so many etymological fallacies, the interpretation ek-tang, 'one-leg,' as if the temporary incumbent had but one leg in the official stirrup."—H. Y. in Quarterly Review (on Bosworth Smith's Life of Lord Lawrence), April, p. 297.

Elchee, s. An ambassador. Turk. elchi, from il, a (nomad) tribe, hence the representative of the il. It is a title that has attached itself particularly to Sir John Malcolm, and to Sir Stratford Canning, probably because they were personally more familiar to the Orientals among whom they served than diplomatists usually are.

1404. "And the people who saw them approaching, and knew them for people of the Emperor's, being aware that they were come with some order from the great Lord, took to flight as if the devil were after them; and those who were in their tents selling their wares, shut them up and also took to flight, and shut themselves up in their houses, calling out one to another, Elchi! which is as much as to say 'Ambassadors!' For they knew that with ambassadors coming they would have a black day of it; and so they fled as if the devil had got among them."—Clavijo, § xevii. Comp. Markham, p. 111.

1885. "No historian of the Crimean War could overlook the officer (Sir Hugh Rose) who, at a difficult crisis, filled the post of the famous diplomatist called the great Elchi by writers who have adopted a tiresome trick from a brilliant man of letters."—Sat. Review, Oct. 24th.

Elephanta, b. Add:

1690. "The Mussoons are rude and Boisterous in their departure, as well as at their coming in, which two Seasons are called the Elephant in India, and just before their breaking up, take their farewell for the most part in very rugged puffing weather."—Ovington, 137.

Elephant, s. This article will be confined to notes connected with the various suggestions that have been put forward as to the origin of the word—a sufficiently ample subject.

The oldest occurrence of the word (ἐλέφας—phantos) is in Homer. With him, and so with Hesiod and Pindar, the word means 'ivory.' Herodotus first uses it as the name of the animal (iv. 191). Hence an occasional, probably an erroneous, assumption that the word ἐλέφας originally meant only the material, and not the beast that bears it.

In Persian the usual term for the beast is pīl, with which agree the Aramaic pīl (already found in the Chaldee and Syriac versions of the O. T.), and the Arabic fil. Old etymologists tried to develop elephant out of fil; and it is natural to connect with it the Spanish for 'ivory' (marfil, Port. marfim), but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the first syllable of that word. More certain is the fact that in early Swedish and Danish the word for 'elephant' is fil, in Icelandic fill; a term supposed to have been introduced by old traders from the East viâ Russia. The old Swed. for 'ivory' is filshen.*

The oldest Hebrew mention of ivory is in the notice of the products brought to Solomon from Ophir, or India. Among these are ivory tusks—shen-habbim, i.e. 'teeth of habbim,' a word which has been interpreted as from Skt. ibha, elephant.† But it is entirely doubtful what this habbim, occurring here only, really means.‡

* Pīlu, for elephant, occurs in certain Sanskrit books, but it is regarded as a foreign word.

† See Lussen, i. 313; Max Muller's Lectures on Sc. of Language, 1st S. p. 189.

‡ "As regards the interpretation of habbim, a šēn Ḳery, in a passage where the state of the text, as shown by comparison with the LXX, is very unsatisfactory, it seems impossible to say anything that can be of the least use in clearing up the origin of elephant. The O. T. speaks so often of ivory, and never again by this name, that habbim must be either a corruption or some trade-name,

We know from other evidence that ivory was known in Egypt and Western Asia for ages before Solomon. And in other cases the Hebrew word for ivory is simply shen, corresponding to dens Indus in Ovid and other Latin writers. In Ezekiel (xxvii. 15) we find karnoth shen = 'cornua dentis.' The use of the word horns does not necessarily imply a confusion of these great curved tusks with horns; it has many parallels, as in Pliny's: "cum arbore ecacuant limentque cornua elephanti" (xviii. 7); in Martial's "Indicoque cornu" (i. 73); in Aelian's story, as alleged by the Mauritanians, that the elephants there shed their horns every ten years ("δεκάτω ἐτει πάντως τὰ κέρατα ἐκπέσειν" (xiv. 5); whilst Cleasby quotes from an Icelandic saga 'olifant-horni' for 'ivory.'

We have mentioned Skt. ibha, from which Lassen assumes a compound ibhadantā for ivory, suggesting that this, combined by early traders with the Arabic article, formed al-ibhadantā, and so originated ἑλέφαντος. Pott, besides other doubts, objects that ibhadantā, though the name of a plant (Tiaridium indicum, Lehm.), is never actually a name of ivory.

Pott's own etymology is alaf-hindi, 'Indian ox,' from a word existing in sundry resembling forms, in Hebrew and in Assyrian (alif, alap).* This has met with favour; though it is a little hard to accept any form like Hindi as earlier than Homer.

Other suggested origins are Pictet's from airāvata (lit. 'proceeding from water'), the proper name of the elephant of Indra, or Elephant of the Eastern Quarter in the Hindu Cosmology.† This is felt to be only too ingenious, but as improbable. It is, however, suggested, it would seem, independently, by Mr. Kittel (Indian Antiquary, i. 128), who supposes the first part of the word to be Dravidian, a transformation from āne, 'elephant.'

Pictet, finding his first suggestion not accepted, has called up a Singhalese word aliya, used for elephant, which he takes to be from āla, 'great'; thence aliya, 'great creature'; and, proceeding further, presents a combination of ala, 'great,' with Skt. phata, sometimes signifying 'a tooth,' thus aliphata, 'great tooth' = elephantus.*

Hodgson, in 'Notes on Northern Africa' (p. 19, quoted by Pott), gives elef amegran ('Great Boar,' elef being 'boar') as the name of the animal among the Kabyles of that region, and appears to present it as the origin of the Greek and Latin words.

Again we have the Gothic ulbandus, 'a camel,' which has been regarded by some as the same word with elephantus. To this we shall recur.

Pott, in his elaborate paper already quoted, comes to the conclusion that the choice of etymologies must lie between his own alaf-hindi and Lassen's al-ibha-dantā. His paper is 35 years old, but he repeats this conclusion in his Wurzel-Wörterbuch der Indo-Germanische Sprachen, published in 1871,† nor can I ascertain that there has been any later advance towards a true etymology. Yet it can hardly be said that either of the alternatives carries conviction.

Both, let it be observed, apart from other difficulties, rest on the assumption that the knowledge of ἑλέφας, whether as fine material or as monstrous animal, came from India, whilst nearly all the other or less-favoured suggestions point to the same assumption.

But knowledge acquired, or at least taken cognizance of, since Pott's latest reference to the subject, puts us in possession of the new and surprising fact that, even in times which we are entitled to call historic, the elephant existed wild, far to the westward of India, and not very far from the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean. Though the fact was indicated from the wall-paintings by Wilkinson some 50 years ago,‡ and has more recently been amply displayed in historical works which have circulated by scores in popular libraries, it is singular how little attention or interest it seems to have elicited.§ presumably for some special kind of ivory. Personally, I believe it far more likely that habbim is at bottom the same as hobnim (ebony?) associated with shen in Ezekiel xxvii. 15, and that the passage once ran 'ivory and ebony' (W. Robertson Smith).

§ See e.g. Brugsch's Hist. of the Pharaohs, 2d ed. i. 396-400; and Canon Rawlinson's Egypt, ii. 235-6.

The document which gives precise Egyptian testimony to this fact is an inscription (first interpreted by Ebers in 1873)* from the tomb of Amenemhib, a captain under the great conqueror Thotmes III., who reigned B.C. c. 1600. This warrior, speaking from his tomb of the great deeds of his master, and of his own right arm, tells how the king, in the neighbourhood of NI, hunted 120 elephants for the sake of their tusks; and how he himself (Amenemhib) encountered the biggest of them, which had attacked the sacred person of the king, and cut through its trunk. The elephant chased him into the water, where he saved himself between two rocks; and the king bestowed on him rich rewards.

The position of NI is uncertain, though some have identified it with Nineveh.† It is named in another inscription between Arinath and Akerith, as, all three, cities of Naharain or Northern Mesopotamia, captured by Amenhotep II., the son of Thotmes III. Might not NI be Nisibis? We shall find that Assyrian inscriptions of later date have been interpreted as placing elephant-hunts in the land of Harran and in the vicinity of the Chaboras.

If then these elephant-hunts may be located on the southern skirts of Taurus, we shall more easily understand how a tribute of elephant-tusks should have been offered at the court of Egypt by the people of Rutennu or Northern Syria, and also by the people of the adjacent Asebi or Cyprus, as we find repeatedly recorded on the Egyptian monuments, both in hieroglyphic writing and pictorially.‡

What the stones of Egypt allege in the 17th cent. B.C., the stones of Assyria 500 years afterwards have been alleged to corroborate.

The great Inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I., who is calculated to have reigned about B.C. 1120-1100, as rendered by Lotz, relates :

“Ten mighty Elephants Slew I in Harran, and on the banks of the Chaboras.
Four Elephants I took alive;
Their hides,
Their teeth, and the live Elephants
I brought to my city Assur.”*

The same facts are recorded in a later inscription, on the broken obelisk of Assurnazirpal from Kouyunjik, now in the Br. Museum, which commemorates the deeds of the king's ancestor Tiglath Pileser.†

In the case of these Assyrian inscriptions, however, elephant is by no means an undisputed interpretation. In the famous quadruple test exercise on this inscription in 1857, which gave the death-blow to the doubts which some sceptics had emitted as to the genuine character of the Assyrian interpretations, Sir Henry Rawlinson, in this passage, rendered the animals slain and taken alive as wild buffaloes. The ideogram given as teeth he had not interpreted. The question is argued at length by Lotz in the work already quoted, but it is a question for cuneiform experts, dealing, as it does, with the interpretation of more than one ideogram, and enveloped as yet in uncertainties. It is to be observed, that in 1857 Dr. Hincks, one of the four test-translators,‡ had rendered the passage almost exactly as Lotz has done 23 years later, though I cannot see that Lotz makes any allusion to this fact.

Apart from arguments as to decipherment and ideograms, it is certain that probabilities are much affected by the publication of the Egyptian inscription of Amenhotep, which gives a greater plausibility to the rendering ‘elephant’ than could be ascribed to it in 1857. And should it eventually be upheld, it will be all the more remarkable that the sagacity of Dr. Hincks should have then ventured on that rendering.

In various suggestions, including Pott's, besides others which we have omitted, the etymology has been based on a transfer of the name of the ox, or some other familiar quadruped. There would be nothing extraordinary in such a transfer of meaning. The reference to the bos Luca * is trite; the Tibetan word for ox (glan) is also the word for 'elephant'; we have seen how the name 'Great Boar' is alleged to be given to the elephant among the Kabyles; we have heard of an elephant in a menagerie being described by a Scotch rustic as 'a muckle sow'; Pausanias, according to Bochart, calls rhinoceroses 'Æthiopic bulls.' And let me finally illustrate the matter by a circumstance related to me by a brother officer who accompanied Sir Neville Chamberlain on an expedition among the turbulent Pathan tribes c. 1860. The women of the villages gathered to gaze on the elephants that accompanied the force, a stranger sight to them than it would have been to the women of the most secluded village in Scotland. 'Do you see these?' said a soldier of the Frontier Horse; 'Do you know what they are? These are the Queen of England's buffaloes that give 5 maunds (about 160 quarts) of milk a day!'

Now it is an obvious suggestion, that if there were elephants on the skirts of Taurus down to B.C. 1100, or even (taking the less questionable evidence) down only to B.C. 1600, it is highly improbable that the Greeks would have had to seek a name for the animal, or its tusk, from Indian trade. And if the Greeks had a vernacular name for the elephant, there is also a probability, if not a presumption, that some tradition of this name would be found, mutatis mutandis, among other Aryan nations of Europe.

Now may it not be that Ἐλέφαντος in Greek, and ulbandus in Moeso-Gothic, represent this vernacular name? The latter form is exactly that modification of the former which Grimm's law demands. Nor is the word confined to Gothic. It is found in Old H. German (olpentā); in Anglo-Saxon (olfend, olwend, &c.); in Old Swedish (aelpand, alwandyr, ulfwald); in Icelandic (ulfaldi). All these northern words, it is true, are used in the sense of camel, not of elephant. But instances already given may illustrate that there is nothing surprising in this transfer, all the less where the animal originally indicated had been long lost sight of. Further, Jülg, who has published a paper on the Gothic word,* points out its resemblance to the Slav forms welbond, welblond, or wielblad, also meaning 'camel' (compare also Russian verblud). This, in the last form (wielblad), may, he says, be regarded as resolvable into 'Great beast.' Herr Jülg ends his paper with a hint that in this meaning may perhaps be found a solution of the origin of elephant (an idea at which Pictet also transiently pointed in a paper referred to above), and half promises to follow up this hint; but in thirty years he has not done so, so far as I can discover. Nevertheless it is one which may yet be pregnant.

Nor is it inconsistent with this suggestion that we find also in some of the Northern languages a second series of names designating the elephant—not, as we suppose ulbandus and its kin to be, common vocables descending from a remote age in parallel development—but adoptions from Latin at a much more recent period. Thus, we have in Old and Middle German Elefant and Helfant, with elfenbein and helfenbein for ivory; in Anglo-Saxon, ylpend, elpend, with shortened forms ylp and elp, and ylpenban for ivory; whilst the Scandinavian tongues adopt and retain fil.

Elk. Correct by substituting "sam-bar of Upper and Western India." The barasinghā is a different deer. See Sambre, and Barasinha.

Elu. This, the name by which is known an ancient form of the Singhalese language from which the modern vernacular of Ceylon is immediately derived, "and to which" the latter "bears something of the same sort of relation that the English of to-day bears to Anglo-Saxon. Fundamentally Elu and Singhalese are identical, and the difference of form which they present is due partly to the large number of new grammatical forms evolved by the modern language, and "The name Elu is no other than Sinhala much corrupted, standing for an older form, Hēla or Hēlu, which occurs in some ancient works, and this again for a still older, Sēla, which brings us back to the Pali Sihala" (Ibid.). The loss of the initial sibilant has other examples in Singhalese (see also under Ceylon).

Fakeer. Add:

1604. "Muley Bofers sent certain Fakers, held of great estimation amongst the Moors, to his Brother Muley Sidan, to treat conditions of Peace."—Coll. of Hist. of Barbarie, in Purchas, ii. 857.

1763. "Received a letter from Dacca dated 29th Novr., desiring our orders with regard to the Fakirs who were taken prisoners at the retaking of Dacca."—Ft. William Cons., Dec. 5, in Long, 342.

On these latter Fakirs, see under Sun-yasee in Gloss.

Fanam. Add:

The weights of a large number of ancient fanams given by Mr. Thomas in a note to his Puthan Kings of Delhi show that the average weight was 6 grs. of gold.

1678. "2. Whosoever shall profane the name of God by swearing or cursing, he shall pay 4 fanams to the use of the poore for every oath or curse."—Orders agreed on by the Governor and Council of Ft. St. Geo., Oct. 28. In Notes and Extracts, No. I. p. 85.

Fedea. Add:

Prof. Robertson Smith suggests that this may be the Arabic denomination of a small coin used in Egypt, fadda (i.e. 'silverling'). It may be an objection that the letter zwād used in that word is generally pronounced in India as a z.

The fadda is the Turkish pāra,  $\frac{1}{40}$  of a piastre, an infinitesimal value now. But, according to Lane, the name was originally given to half-dirhems, coined early in the fifteenth century, and these would be worth about  $\frac{5}{32}$  l. The fedea of 1554 would be about  $\frac{1}{4}$  l. This rather indicates the identity of the names.

Ferozeshuhur, Feroshuhr, Pherū-shahr, n. p.

The last of these appears to be the correct representation of this name of the scene of the hard-fought battle of 21st-22nd December, 1845. For, according to Capt. R. C. Temple, the Editor of Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 116 (1885), the village was named after Bhāi Pherū, a Sikh saint of the beginning of this century, who lies buried at Mīan-ke-Tahsīl in Lahore District.

Firefly. Add:

1675. "We . . . left our Burnt Wood on the Right-hand, but entred another made us better Sport, deluding us with false Flashes, that you would have thought the Trees on a Flame, and presently, as if untouch'd by Fire, they retained their wonted Verdure. The Coolies beheld the Sight with Horror and Amazement . . . where we found an Host of Flies, the Subject both of our Fear and Wonder . . . This gave my Thoughts the Contemplation of that Miraculous Bush crowned with Innocent Flames, . . . the Fire that consumes everything seeming rather to dress than offend it."—Fryer, 141-142.

1682. "Fireflies (de vuur-vliegen) are so called by us because at eventide, whenever they fly they burn so like fire, that from a

Flying-Fox. Add (with reference to the fact stated by Sir George Yule):

"I have been positively assured by natives that on the Odeypore lake in Rajputana the crocodiles rise to catch these bats, as they follow in line, touching the water. Fancy fly-fishing for crocodile with such a fly!"—(Communication from M.-Gen. R. II. Keatinge.)

Galle, Point de. Add:

1585. "Dopo haver navigato tre giorni senza veder terra, al primo di Maggio fummo in vista di Punta di Gallo, laquale è assai pericolosa da costeggiare."—G. Balbi, f. 19.

Ganda. Add:

The following is from a story of Correa about a battle between "Boher Mirza" (i.e., Sultan Baber) and a certain King "Cacandar" (Sikandar?), in which I have been unable to trace even what events it misrepresents. But it keeps Fernan Mendez Pinto in countenance, as regards the latter's statement about the advance of the King of the Tartars against Peking with four score thousand rhinoceroses!

"The King Cacandar divided his army into five battles well arrayed, consisting of 140,000 horse and 280,000 foot, and in front of them a battle of 800 elephants, which fought with swords upon their tusks, and on their backs castles with archers and musketeers. And in front of the elephants 80 rhinoceroses (gandas), like that which went to Portugal, and which they call bichā (?); these on the horn which they have over the snout carried three-pronged iron weapons with which they fought very stoutly . . . and the Mogors with their arrows made a great discharge, wounding many of the elephants and the gandas, which as they felt the arrows, turned and fled, breaking up the battles . . .”—Correa, iii. 573-574.

Garden-house. Add:

1747. “In case of an Attack at the Garden House, if by a superior Force they should be oblig’d to retire, according to orders and send a Horseman before them to advise of the Approach . . .”—Report of Council of War at Fort St. David’s, in India Office MS. Records.

Gaurian, adj. This is a convenient name which has been adopted of late years as a generic name for the existing Aryan languages of India, i.e., those which are radically sprung from, or cognate to, the Sanskrit. The name (according to Mr. E. L. Brandreth) was given by Professor Hoernle; but it is in fact an adoption and adaptation of a term used by the Pundits of Northern India. They divide the colloquial languages of (civilized) India into the 5 Gauras and 5 Drāvirus. The Gauras of the Pundits appear to be (1) Bongalee (Bangālī) which is the proper language of Gauda, or Northern Bengal from which the name is taken (see Gour, c. in Gloss.), (2) Oriya, the language of Orissa, (3) Hindi, (4) Panjābī, (5) Sindhi; their Drāvira languages are (1) Telinga, (2) Kārṇāṭaka (Canarese), (3) Marāṭhī, (4) Gūrjara (Gujarātī), (5) Drāvira (Tamil). But of these last (3) and (4) are really to be classed with the Gaurian group, so that the latter is to be considered as embracing 7 principal languages. Kashmirī, Singalese, and the languages or dialects of Assam, of Nepaul, and some others, have been also added to the list of this class.

The extraordinary analogies between the changes in grammar and phonology from Sanskrit in passing into these Gaurian languages, and the changes of Latin in passing into the Romance languages, analogies extending into minute details, have been treated by several scholars; and a very interesting view of the subject is given by Mr. Brandreth in vols. xi. and xii. of the J. R. As. Soc., N. S.

Gautama. Add:

1545. “I will pass by them of the sect of Godomem, who spend their whole life in crying day and night on those mountains, Godomem, Godomem, and desist not from it until they fall down stark dead to the ground.”—F. M. Pinto (in Cogan, p. 222).

Gavial, s. This is a name adopted by zoologists for one of the alligators of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, Gavialis gangeticus, etc. It is the less dangerous of the Gangetic saurians, with long slender subcylindrical jaws expanding into a protuberance at the muzzle. The name must have originated in some error, probably a clerical one, for the true word is H. gharīyāl, and gavial is nothing. The term (gariyāl) is used by Baber (p. 410), where the translator’s note says: “The geriali is the round-mouthed crocodile,” words which seem to indicate the magar (Crocodilus biporcatus) not the gharīyāl.

c. 1809. “In the Brohmoputro as well as the Ganges there are two kinds of crocodile, which at Goyalpara are both called Kumir; but each has a specific name. The Crocodilus Gangeticus is called Ghorīyal, and the other is called Bongcha.”—Buchanan’s Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 581-2.

Gazat, s. This is domestic Hind. for ‘dessert.’ (Panjab N. and Q., ii. 184).

Gentoo. Add:

Under a:

1679. In Fort St. Geo. Consns. of 29th January, the Black Town of Madras is called “the Gentue Town.”—Notes and Extracts, No. II., p. 3.

Under b (Id. No. I. p. 32):

1674. “50 Pagodas gratuity to John Thomas ordered for good progress in the Gentu tongue, both speaking and writing.”

Ghauts. Add:

The following passage indicates that the great Sir Walter, with his usual sagacity, saw the true sense of the word in its geographical use, though misled by books to attribute to the (so-called) ‘Eastern Ghauts’ the character that belongs to the Western only.

1827. “. . . they approached the Ghauts, those tremendous mountain passes which descend from the table-land of Mysore, and through which the mighty streams that arise in the centre of the Indian Peninsula find their way to the ocean.”—The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiii.

Ghurry. Add:

The water-instrument is sometimes called pun-g hurry (pangharī quasi pānī-g hurry); also the Sun-dial, dhoop-g hurry (dhūp = 'Sunshine'); the hour-glass, (ret-g hurry (retā = 'sand').

Gingeli. Add:

It is the σῆσαρον of Dioscorides (ii. 121), and of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. i. 11).

Gingerly. Add:

We find in Fort St. Geo. Consns. 1680-81, in App. to Notes and Queries, No. III. p. 47.

"The form of the pass given to ships and vessels, and Register of Passes given (18 in all), bound to Jafnapatam, Manilla, Mocha, Gingerlee, Tenasserim, &c."

Also,

1753. "Some authors give the Coast between the points of Devi and Gaudewari, the name of the Coast of Gergelin. The Portuguese give the name of Gergelim to the plant which the Indians call Ellu, from which they extract a kind of oil."—D'Anville, 134.

The Carte Marine depuis Suratte jusqu'au Détroit de Malacca, par le R. Père P. P. Tachard, 1701, shows the coast tract between Vesegapatam and Iagrenate as Gergelin.

But these quotations throw no light on the gold coin of Milburn.

Gingham. Add:

1648. "The principal names (of the stuffs) are these: Gamiguins, Baftas, Chelas,* Assamanis (asmānis? sky-blues), Madafoene, Beronis (Belramees) Tricandias, Chittes (Chintzes), Langans (Langotis?), Taffochillen,† Dotias (dhotees)."—Van Twist, 63.

Gingi, n. p. Properly Chenji. A once celebrated hill-fortress in S. Arcot, 50 m. N.E. of Uddalore, 35 m. N.W. from Pondicherry, and at one time the seat of a Mahratta principality. It played an important part in the wars of the first three-quarters of the last century, and was held by the French from 1750 to 1761. The place is now entirely deserted.

c. 1616. "And then they were to publish a proclamation in Negapatam, that no one was to trade at Tevenapatam, at Porto Novo, or at any other port of the naik of Ginja, or of the King of Massulapatam, because these were declared enemies of the state, and all possible war should be made on them for having received among them the Hollanders. . . ."—Bocarro, p. 619.

1675. "Approve the treaty with the Cawn of Chengie."—Letter from Court to Fort St. Geo. In Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 5.

1680. "Advice received . . . that Santogee, a younger brother of Seavage's, had seized upon Rongnaut Pundit, the Soobidar of Chengy Country, and put him in irons."—Id., No. III., p. 44.

1752. "It consists of two towns, called the Great and Little Gingee. . . . They are both surrounded by one wall, 3 miles in circumference, which incloses the two towns, and five mountains of ragged rock, on the summits of which are built 5 strong forts. . . . The place is inaccessible, except from the east and south-east. . . . The place was well supplied with all manner of stores, and garrisoned by 150 Europeans, and sepoys and black people in great numbers. . . ."—Cambridge, Account of the War, &c., 32-33.

Girja. Add:

1885. "It is related that a certain Maulvi, celebrated for the power of his curses, was called upon by his fellow religionists to curse a certain church built by the English in close proximity to a Masjid. Anxious to stand well with them, and at the same time not to offend his English rulers, he got out of the difficulty by cursing the building thus:—

'Gir jā ghar! Gir jā ghar! Gir jā!'

(i.e.) 'Fall down, house! Fall down, house! Fall down!' or simply 'Church-house! Church-house! Church!'

—W. J. D'Gruyther, in Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 125.

The word is also in use in the Indian Archipelago, e.g.:

1885. "The village (of Wai in the Moluccas) is laid out in rectangular plots. . . . One of its chief edifices is the Gredja, whose grandeur quite overwhelmed us; for it is far more elaborately decorated than many a rural parish church at home."—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, p. 294.

Goa-Stone. Add:

1690. "The double excellence of this Stone (snake-stone) recommends its worth very highly . . . and much excels the deservedly famed Gaspar Antoni, or Goa Stone."—Ovington, 262.

1768-71. "Their medicines are mostly such as are produced in the country. Amongst others, they make use of a kind of little artificial stone, that is manufactured at Goa, and possesses a strong aromatic scent. They give scrapings of this, in a little water mixed with sugar, to their patients."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 454.

Gobang, s. The game introduced some years ago from Japan. The name is a corr. of Chinese K'i-p'an, 'checker-board.'

* See Chellos under Fiece-goods, and Shelah, a cotton cloth from the Deccan.—Atn. p. 95.

† Tafila, a gold stuff from Mecca; see under Adati, and note under Alleja.

Godavery. Add after the quotation from Rennell:

As to this error see also a quotation from D'Anville in SUPPT., under Kedgeriee (n. p.).

It is probable from what that geographer says in his Éclaircissemens, p. 133, that he had no real idea of the Godavery. That name occurs in his book only as "la pointe de Gaudewari." This point, he says, is about E.N.E. of the 'river of Narsapur,' at a distance of about 12 leagues; "it is a low land, intersected by several river-arms, forming the mouths of that which the maps, esteemed to be most correct, call Wenserson; and the river of Narsapur is itself one of those arms, according to a MS. map in my possession."

Narsapuram is the name of a taluk on the westernmost delta branch, or Vasishta Godavari. Wenserson appears on a map in Baldaeus (1672), as the name of one of the two mouths of the eastern or Gautami Godavari, entering the sea near Coringa. It is perhaps the same name as Injaram on that branch, where there was an English factory for many years.

Goglet. Add:

1766. "I perfectly remember having said that it would not be amiss for General Carnac to have a man with a Goglet of water ready to pour on his head, whenever he should begin to grow warm in debate."—Lord Clive, Consn. Fort William, Jan. 29. In Long, 406.

Gomasta. Add:

1747. "As for the Salem Cloth they beg leave to defer settling any Price for that sort till they can be advised from the Goa Masters (!) in that Province."—Fort St. David Consn., May 11. MS. Records in India Office.

Gong. Add:

1726. "These gongs (gongen) are beaten very gently at the time when the Prince is going to make his appearance."—Valentijn, iv. 58.

Goodry. Add:

1653. "Goudrin est vn terme Indou et Portugais, qui signifie des couvertures piquées de cotton."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 539.

Goojur. Add:

1519. "In the hill-country between Nilāb and Behreh . . . and adjoining to the hill-country of Kashmir, are the Jats, Gujers, and many other men of similar tribes. . . ."—Memoirs of Baber, 259.

Goolail. Add:

1560. Busbeck speaks of being much annoyed with the multitude and impudence of kites at Constantinople: "ego interim cum manuali balista post columnam sto, modo hujus, modo illius caudae vel alarum, ut casus tulerit, pinnas testaceis globis verberans, donec mortifero ictu unam aut alteram percussam decutio. . . ."—Busbeq. Epist. III., p. 163.

Goont. Add:

1388. "Give your günth his head and he will carry you safely . . . any horse would have struggled, and been killed; these günths appear to understand that they must be quiet, and their master will help them."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 226.

Goorka, Goorkally, n. p. H. Gürkha, Gurkhālī. The name of the race now dominant in Nepāl, and taking their name from a town so-called 53 miles W. of Khatmandu. They are probably the best soldiers of modern India, and several regiments of the Anglo-Indian army are recruited from the tribe.

1767. "I believe, Sir, you have before been acquainted with the situation of Nipal, which has long been besieged by the Goorcully Rajah."—Letter from Chief at Patna, in Long, 526.

Gorawallah. Add:

1680. Gurriāls, apparently for ghor-wālās,* are allowed with the horses kept with the Hoogly Factory.—See Fort St. Geo. Consn., on Tour, Dec. 12, in Notes and Extracts, No. II., p. 63.

Gordower. Add:

Ghor daur, a horse-race, hence 'a race-meeting,' is sometimes used by natives to express any kind of open-air assemblage of Europeans for amusement.

Gosbeck. Add:

In Fryer, p. 407, we have the following:

"Brass money with characters, Are a Goss, ten whereof compose a Shahce, A Gosbeege, five of which go to a Shahce . . ."

Thus we have a Goss and a Gosbegi, corresponding to Herbert's double and single Cozbeg.

And now I see that Mr. Wollaston, in his English-Persian Dict. App., p. 436, among "Moneys now current in * Gurriāls would be alligators!

Persia," gives "5 dinâr=1 ghâz; also a nominal money." The ghâz, then, is the name of the coin (though a coin no longer); and ghâz-begî was that worth 10 dinârs.

Marsden mentions a copper coin, called Kazbegi=50 (nominal) dinârs, or about 3*d*. (Numism. Orient., 456). But the value in dinârs seems to be an error.

Goung, s. Burm. gaung; a village headman.

Grab. Add, after quotation from Ibn Batuta:

1503. In the Vocabulary of Pedro de Alcalá, guleru is interpreted in Arabic as gorâb.

Griffin, Griffish. Add:

1853.

"Like drill?"

"I don't dislike it much now; the goose-step was not lively."

"Ah, they don't give griffs half enough of it now-a-days; by Jove, sir, when I was a griff—and thereupon . . ."—Oakfield, i. 62.

The quotation in the Glossary (p. 303, col. b) from Bontius gives the Dutchman's phrase corresponding to Griffin, viz., Orang-baharu, i.e., (Malay) 'new man'; whilst Orang-lama, 'man of long since,' is applied to old colonials. In connexion with these terms we extract the following:

c. 1790. "Si je n'avois pas été un oorlam, et si un long séjour dans l'Inde ne m'avoit pas accoutumé à cette espèce de fleau, j'aurais certainement souffert l'impossible durant cette nuit."—Haafner, ii. 26-27.

On this his editor notes:

"Oorlam est un mot Malais corrompu; il faut dire Orang-lama, ce qui signifie une personne qui a déjà été long-temps dans un endroit, ou dans un pays, et c'est par ce nom qu'on désigne les Européens qui ont habité depuis un certain temps dans l'Inde. Ceux qui ne font qu'y arriver, sont appelés Baar; denomination qui vient du mot Malais Orang-Baru . . . un homme nouvellement arrivé."

Gruff. Add:

1750. " . . . all which could be called Curtains, and some of the Bastions at Madras, had Warehouses under them for the Reception of Naval Stores, and other gruff Goods from Europe, as well as Salt Petre from Bengal."—Letter to a Propr. of the E. I. Co., p. 52.

Grunth. Add:

1770. "As the young man (Nānak) was early introduced to the knowledge of the most esteemed writings of the Mussulmen . . . he made it a practice in his leisure hours to translate literally or virtually, as his mind prompted him, such of their maxims as made the deepest impression on his heart. This was in the idiom of Pendjab, his maternal language. Little by little he strung together these loose sentences, reduced them into some order, and put them in verses. . . His collection became numerous; it took the form of a book which was entitled Grenth."—Seir Mutaqherin, i. 89.

Grunthum. Add:

1753. "Les Indiens du pays se donnent le nom de Tamules, et on sait que la langue vulgaire différente du Sanskret, et du Grendam, qui sont les langues sacrées, porte le même nom."—D'Anville, 117.

Guana. Add:

The following quotation shows the persistence of the story of this creature in the passage from Fryer, s.v.

1885. "One of my moonshis, José Prethoo, a Concani of one of the numerous families descended from Xavier's converts, gravely informed me that in the old days *iguana*s were used in gaining access to besieged places; for, said he, a large iguana, sahib, is so strong that if 3 or 4 men laid hold of its tail he could drag them up a wall or tree!"—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, 56.

Guava. M.-Gen. Keatinge notes:

"Jām is the name, as far as I know, all over Guzerat, and the Central Provinces also."

Gudge. Add:

1754. "Some of the townsmen again demanded of me to open my bales, and sell them some pieces of cloth; but . . . I rather chose to make several of them presents of 2½ gaz of cloth, which is the measure they usually take for a coat."—Hanway, i. 125.

1768-71. "A gess or goss is 2 cobidos, being at Chinsurah 2 feet and 10 inches Rhineland measure."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 463.

Guinea-cloths. Add:

These are presumably the Negros-tücher of Baldaeus (1672), p. 154.

Guinea-fowl. Add:

The Guinea-fowl is the Meleagris of Aristotle and others, and the Afru avis of Horace.

Guinea-worm. Add:

The article omits to mention the prevalence of this pest in some parts of Western India. "I have known villages," writes M.-Gen. Keatinge, "where half the people were maimed by it after the Rains. Matunga, the Head Quarters of the Bombay Artillery, was abandoned, in great measure, on account of this pest."

1712. "Haec vita est Ormusiensium, imò civium totius littoris Persici, ut perpetuas in corpore calamitates ferant ex coeli intemperie: modo sudore diffiunt; modo vexantur furunculis; nunc cibi sunt, mox aquae inopes; saepe ventis urentibus, semper sole torrente, squalent, et quis omnia recenseat? Unum ex aerumnis gravioribus induco: nimirum Lumbricorum singulare genus, quod non in intestinis, sed in musculis per corporis ambitum natales invenit. Latini medici vermem illum nomine donant τοῦ δράκοντος, s. Dracunculi. . . Guineenses nigritiae linguā suā . . . vermes illos vocant Ikôn, ut produnt reduces ex aurifero illo Africae littore. . ."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot., 524-5.

Kaempfer speculates as to why the old physicians called it dracunculus; but the name was evidently taken from the δράκοντος of Agatharchides, quoted in the GLOSSARY, s.v.

1774. See an account of this pest under the name of "le ver des nerfs (Vena Medinensis)," in Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 117.

The name given by Niebuhr is, as we learn from Kaempfer's remarks, 'urak Medinâ, the Medina nerve (rather than vein).

Gum-gum. Add:

1768-71. "They have a certain kind of musical instruments called gom-goms, consisting in hollow iron bowls, of various sizes and tones, upon which a man strikes with an iron or wooden stick . . . not unlike a set of bells."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 215. See also p. 65.

Gunny. Add:

1885. "The land was so covered with them (plover) that the hunters shot them with all sorts of arms. We counted 80 birds in the gunny-sack that three of the soldiers brought in."—Boots and Saddles, by Mrs. Custer, p. 37. (American work.)

Gunta, s. H. ghanta, a bell or gong. This is the common term for expressing an European hour, in modern Hindustani.

Gureeb nuwauz. Add:

The passage quoted from Valentijn has been derived by the latter from Van Twist (1648), p. 55.

1867. "'Protector of the poor!' he cried, prostrating himself at my feet, 'help thy most unworthy and wretched slave! An unblest and evil-minded alligator has this day devoured my little daughter. She went down to the river to fill her earthen jar with water, and the evil one dragged her down, and has devoured her. Alas! she had on her gold bangles. Great is my misfortune!'"—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 99.

Gutta Percha. Add:

1868. "The late Mr. d'Almeida was the first to call the attention of the public to the substance now so well known as gutta-percha. At that time the Isonandra Gutta was an abundant tree in the forests of Singapore, and was first known to the Malays, who made use of the juice which they obtained by cutting down the trees . . . Mr. d'Almeida . . . acting under the advice of a friend, forwarded some of the substance to the Society of Arts. There it met with no immediate attention, and was put away uncared for. A year or two afterwards Dr. Montgomery sent specimens to England, and bringing it under the notice of competent persons, its value was at once acknowledged . . . The sudden and great demand for it soon resulted in the disappearance of all the gutta-percha trees on Singapore Island."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 268-269.

Gwalior, n. p. Hind. Gwālār. A very famous rock-fortress of Upper India, rising suddenly and picturesquely out of a plain (or shallow valley rather) to a height of 300 feet, 65 miles S. of Agra, in lat. 26° 13'. Gwalior may be traced back, in Gen. Cunningham's opinion, to the 3rd century of our era. It was the seat of several ancient Hindū dynasties, and from the time of the early Mahomedan sovereigns of Delhi down to the reign of Aurangzib it was used as a state-prison. During last century it fell into the possession of the Marhatta family of Sindhia, whose residence was established to the south of the fortress, in what was originally a camp, but has long been a city, known by the original title of Lashkar (camp). The older city lies below the northern foot of the rock. Gwalior has been three times taken by British arms; (1) escalated by a force under the command of Major Popham in 1780, a very daring feat; * (2) by a regular attack under Gen. White in 1805; (3) most gallantly in June, 1858, by a party of the 25th Bombay N. I. under Lieutenants Rose and Waller, in which the former officer fell. After the two first captures the fortress was restored to the Sindhia family. From 1858 it was retained in our hands, but it has now (December, 1885) been formally restored to the Mahārājā Sindhia.

* The two companies which escalated were led by Captain Bruce, a brother of the Abyssinian traveller. "It is said that the spot was pointed out to Popham by a cowherd, and that the whole of the attacking party were supplied with grass shoes to prevent them from slipping on the ledges of rock. There is a story also that the cost of these grass-shoes was deducted from Popham's pay, when he was about to leave India as a major-general, nearly a quarter of a century afterwards."—Cunningham, Arch. Surv. ii. 340.

The name of the fortress, according to Gen. Cunningham (Archæol. Survey, ii. 335), is derived from a small Hindū shrine within it dedicated to the hermit Gwāli or Gwāli-pā, after whom the fortress received the name of Gwāli-āwar, contracted to Gwāliār.

c. 1020. "From Kanauj, in travelling south-east, on the western side of the Ganges, you come to Jajāhoti, at a distance of 30 parasangs, of which the capital is Kajurāha. In that country are the two forts of Gwāliār and Kālinjar . . ."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, i. 57-58.

1196. The royal army marched "towards Gālewār, and invested that fort, which is the pearl of the necklace of the castles of Hind, the summit of which the nimble-footed wind from below cannot reach, and on the bastions of which the clouds have never cast their shade. . ."—Hasan Nizāmī, in Elliot, ii. 227.

c. 1340. "The castle of Gālyūr, of which we have been speaking, is on the top of a high hill, and appears, so to speak, as if it were itself cut out of the rock. There is no other hill adjoining; it contains reservoirs of water, and some 20 wells walled round are attached to it: on the walls are mounted mangonels and catapults. The fortress is ascended by a wide road, traversed by elephants and horses. Near the castle-gate is the figure of an elephant carved in stone, and surmounted by a figure of the driver. Seeing it from a distance one has no doubt about its being a real elephant. At the foot of the fortress is a fine city, entirely built of white stone, mosques and houses alike; there is no timber to be seen in it, except that of the gates."—Ibn Batūtā, ii. 193.

1526. "I entered Guāliār by the Hātipāl gate. . . They call an elephant hātī, and a gate pāl. On the outside of this gate is the figure of an elephant, having two elephant drivers on it. . ."—Baber, p. 383.

1610. "The 31 to Gwalere, 6 c., a pleasant Cittle with a Castle . . . On the West side of the Castle, which is a steep craggy cliffe of 6 c. compasse at least (divers say eleven). . . From hence to the top, leads a stone narrow cawsey, walled on both sides; in the way are three gates to be passed, all exceeding strong, with Courts of guard to each. At the top of all, at the entrance of the last gate, standeth a mightie Elephant of stone very curiously wrought. . ."—Finch, in Purchas, i. 426-7.

1616. "23. Gwalier, the chief City so called, where the Mogol hath a very rich Treasury of Gold and Silver kept in this City, within an exceeding strong Castle, wherein the King's Prisoners are likewise kept. The Castle is continually guarded by a very strong Company of Armed Souldiers."—Terry, ed. 1663, p. 356.

c. 1665. "For to shut them up in Goualeor, which is a Fortress where the Princes are ordinarily kept close, and which is held impregnable, it being situated upon an inaccessible Rock, and having within itself good water, and provision enough for a Garison; that was not an easie thing."—Bernier, E. T., 5.

c. 1670. "Since the Mahometan Kings became Masters of this Countrey, this Fortress of Goualeor is the place where they secure Princes and great Noblemen. Chajehan coming to the Empire by foul-play, caus'd all the Princes and Lords whom he mistrusted, to be seiz'd one after another, and sent them to the Fortress of Goualeor; but he suffer'd them all to live and enjoy their estates. Aureng-zeb his Son acts quite otherwise; for when he sends any great Lord to this place, at the end of nine or ten days he orders him to be poison'd; and this he does that the people may not exclaim against him for a bloody Prince."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 35.

Gyal. Add:

1866-67. "I was awakened by an extraordinary noise, something between a bull's bellow and a railway whistle. What was it? We started to our feet, and Fuzlah and I were looking to our arms when Adupah said, 'It is only the gyal calling; Sahib! Look, the dawn is just breaking, and they are opening the village gates for the beasts to go out to pasture.'

"These gyal were beautiful creatures, with broad fronts, sharp wide-spreading horns, and mild melancholy eyes. They were the indigenous cattle of the hills domesticated by these equally wild Lushais . . ."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, &c., p. 303.

Gynee. Add:

1832. "We have become great farmers, having sown our crop of oats, and are building outhouses to receive some 34 dwarf cows and oxen (gynees) which are to be fed up for the table."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 251.

H.

Hackery. Add:

With reference to the obscure origin of this word it is perhaps worth noticing that in old Singhalese chakka, 'a cart-wheel,' takes the forms haka and saka (see Kuhn, On oldest Aryan Elements of Sinhalese, translated by D.

Ferguson in Indian Antiquary, vol. xii. 64). We have chakra, 'a cart-wheel' and cart, in Hindi. Can this also have developed a form hakra?

c. 1790. "Quant aux palankins et hak-karies (voitures à deux roues), on les passe sur une double sangarie" (see Jangar).—Haafner, ii. 173.

1793. "To be sold by Public Auction . . . a new Fashioned Hackery."—Bombay Courier, April 13th.

1811. "Il y a cependant quelques endroits où l'on se sert de charettes couvertes à deux roues, appelées hickeris, devant lesquelles on attèle des bœufs, et qui servent à voyager."—Editor of Haafner, Voyages, ii. 3.

Halalcore. Add:

1763. "And now I must mention the Hallachores, whom I cannot call a Tribe, being rather the refuse of all the Tribes. These are a set of poor unhappy wretches, destined to misery from their birth . . ."—Reflections, &c., by Luke Scrafton, Esq., 7-8. It was probably in this passage that Burns picked up the word; see quotation in Gloss.

Hanger. Add:

1653. "Gangeard est en Turq, Persan et Indistanni vn poignard courbé."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 539.

1684. "The Souldiers do not wear Hangers or Scimitars like the Persians, but broad Swords like the Switzers . . ."—E. T. of Tavernier, ii. 65.

1712. "His Excy . . . was presented by the Emperor with a Hindoostany Candjer, or dagger, set with fine stones."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 286.

Hansaleri, s. Table-servant's Hind. for 'horse-radish'! "A curious corruption, and apparently influenced by saleri—'celery.'" (Mr. M. L. Dames, in Punjab N. and Q. ii. 184).

Harry. Add:

"2 Tendells	*	*	6	0	0
1 Humnummee †	*	*	2	0	0
4 Manjees	*	*	10	0	0
5 Dandeas	*	*	8	0	0

List of Mens Names, &c., immediately in the Service of the Honble. the United Compy. in their Factory of Port William, Bengall, November, 1706 (MS. in India Office).

1768-71. "Every house has likewise . . . a harry-maid or matarani (see Matranee)

† i.e. harami, a both attendant. Compare the Hindi name in Colonat (see loc.) who carries out the dirt; and a great number of slaves, both male and female."—Stavorinus, i. 523.

It is curious that the hari (or sweeper) caste in Assam, as my friend M.-Gen. Keatinge tells me, are the goldsmiths of the province. They also in some parts of Bengal were the village watchmen. See s.v. Pyke in SUPPL.

Haut, b.

The more correct spelling is hāt from Skt. haṭṭa.

Havildar. Add:

1672. Regarding the Cowle obtained from the Nabob of Golcondah for the Fort and Town of Chinapatnam. 11,000 Pagodas to be paid in full of all demands for the past, and in future Pagodas 1200 per annum rent, "and so to hold the Fort and Town free from any Avildar, or Divan's People, or any other imposition for ever."—Fort St. George Consns., 11th April, in Notes and Extracts, No. I. p. 25.

Havildar's Guard. There is a common way of cooking the fry of fresh-water fish (a little larger than whitebait) as a breakfast dish, by frying them in rows of a dozen or so, spitted on a small skewer. On the Bombay side this dish is known by the whimsical name in question.

Hickmat. Add:

1838. "The house has been roofed in, and my relative has come up from Meerut, to have the slates put on after some peculiar hikmat of his own."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

Hindee. Add:

The term Hinduwi appears to have been formerly used, in the Madras Presidency, for the Marāṭhi language. See a note in Sir A. Arbuthnot's edn. of Munro's Minutes, i. 133.

Hindoo Koosh. Add:

1753. "Les montagnes qui donnent naissance à l'Indus, et à plusieurs des rivières qu'il reçoit, se nomment Hendou Kesh, et c'est l'histoire de l'Imur qui m'instruit de cette denomination. Elle est composée du nom d'Hendou ou Hind, qui désigne l'Inde . . . et de kush ou kesh . . . que je remarque être propre à diverses montagnes."—D'Anville, p. 16.

Hindustanee. Add:

1677. In Court's letter of 12th Decr. to Fort St. Geo. they renew the offer of a reward of £20, for proficiency in the Gentoo or Indostan languages, and sanction a reward of £10 each for proficiency in the Persian language, "and that fit persons to teach the said language be entertained."—Notes and Extracts, No. I. p. 22.

1697. "Questions addressed to Khodja Movaa'd, Ambassador from Abyssinia.

4. "What language he, in his audience, made use of?"

"The Hindustani language (Hindoestanee taal), which the late Hon. Paulus de Roo, then Secretary of their Excellencies the High Government of Batavia, interpreted."—Valentijn, iv. 327.

Hing. Add:

1726. "Hing or Assa Foetida, otherwise called Devil's-dung (Duivelsdrech)."—Valentijn, iv. 146.

Hobson Jobson. Add:

Hong Kong, n. p. The name of this flourishing settlement is hiang-kiang, 'fragrant waterway.' (Bp. Moule).

Hoogly. Add:

1753. "Ugli est une forteresse des Maures . . . Ce lieu étant le plus considérable de la contrée, des Européens qui remontent le Gange, lui ont donné le nom de rivière d'Ugli dans sa partie inférieure . . ."—D'Anville, p. 64.

Hooka. Add:

"In former days it was a dire offence to step over another person's hooka-carpet and hooka snake. Men who did so intentionally were called out." (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

1782. "When he observes that the gentlemen introduce their hookas and smoak in the company of ladies, why did he not add that the mixture of sweet-scented Persian tobacco, sweet herbs, coarse sugar, spice, &c., which they inhale . . . comes through clean water, and is so very pleasant, that many ladies take the tube, and draw a little of the smoak into their mouths."—Price's Tracts, vol. i. p. 78.

Hooluck. Add:

c. 1809. "The Hulluks live in considerable herds; and, although exceedingly noisy, it is difficult to procure a view, their activity in springing from tree to tree being very great; and they are very shy."—Buchanan's Rungpoor, in Eastern India, iii. 563.

1868. "Our only captive this time was a huluq monkey, a shy little beast, very rarely seen or caught. They have black fur with white breasts, and go about usually in pairs, swinging from branch to branch with incredible agility, and making the forest resound with their strange cacinatory cry . . ."—T. Lewin, 374.

Hoonimaun (and Lungoor). Add:

1653. "Hernand est vn singe que les Indou tiennent pour Saintc."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, p. 541.

Hosbolhookhum. Add:

1678. "... the other given in the 10th year of Oranzeeb, for the English to pay 2 per cent. at Surat, which the Mogul interpreted by his order, and Husbull Hookum (id est, a word of command by word of mouth) to his Devan in Bengall, that the English were only to pay 2 per cent. custom at Surat, and in all other his dominions to be custom free."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., 17th Dec., in Notes and Extracts, Pt. I. pp. 97-98.

1757. "This Treaty was conceived in the following Terms. I. Whatever Rights and Privileges the King had granted the English Company, in their Phirmaund, and the Hushulhoorums (sic) sent from Delly, shall not be disputed."—Mem. of the Revolution in Bengal, pp. 21-22.

1769. "Besides it is obvious, that as great a sum might have been drawn from that Company without affecting property . . . or running into his golden dreams of cockets on the Ganges, or visions of Stamp duties, Pervannas, Dusticks, Kistbundeas and Husbulhookums."—Burke, Obsns. on a late Publication called The Present State of the Nation.

Hubshee. Add:

1789. "In India Negroes, Habissinians, Nobis (i.e. Nubians) &c. &c. are promiscuously called Habashies or Habissians, although the two latter are no Negroes; and the Nobies and Habashes differ greatly from one another."—Note to Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 36.

Hummaul. Add:

1554. "To the Xabandar (at Ormuz) for the vessels employed in discharging stores, and for the amals who serve in the custom-house."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 103.

Hurcara. Add:

1747. "Given to the Ircaras for bringing news of the Engagement. (Pag. 4 3 0)."—Fort St. David, Expenses of the Paymaster, under January. MS. Records in India Office.

I.

Idalcan, Hidalcan, and sometimes Idalxa, n. p. The title by which the Portuguese distinguished the kings of the Mahomedan dynasty of Bijapur which rose at the end of the 15th century on the dissolution of the Bahmani kingdom of the Deccan. These names represented Adil Khān, the title of the founder before he became king, more generally called by the Portuguese the Sabaio (q.v.), and 'Adil Shāh, the distinctive style of all the kings of the dynasty. The Portuguese commonly called their kingdom Balaghat (q.v.).

1510. "The Hidalcan entered the city (Goa) with great festivity and rejoicings, and went to the castle to see what the ships were doing, and there, inside and out, he found the dead Moors, whom Timoja had slain; and about them the brothers and parents and wives, raising great wailings and lamentations, thus the festivity of the Hidalcan was celebrated by weepings and wailings . . . so that he sent João Machado to the Governor to speak about terms of peace. . . . The Governor replied that Goa belonged to his lord the K. of Portugal, and that he would hold no peace with him (Hidalcan) unless he delivered up the city with all its territories. . . . With which reply back went João Machado, and the Hidalcan on hearing it was left amazed, saying that our people were sons of the devil. . . ."—Correa, ii. 98.

1516. See Barbosa under Sabaio.

1546. "Trelado de contrato que ho Governador Dom João de Crastro fizez com o Idalxaa, que d'antes se chamava Idalcão."—Tombo, in Subsídios, 39.

1563. "And as those governors grew weary of obeying the King of Daquem (Deccan), they conspired among themselves that each should appropriate his own lands . . . and the great-grandfather of this Adelham who now reigns was one of those captains who revolted; he was a Turk by nation and died in the year 1535; a very powerful man he was always, but it was from him that we twice took by force of arms this city of Goa. . . ."—Garcia, f. 35 v.

N.B.—It was the second of the dynasty who died in 1535; the original 'Adil Khān (or Sabaio) died in 1510, just before the attack of Goa by the Portuguese.

1594-5. "There are three distinct States in the Dakhin. The Nizām-ul-Mulkiya, 'Adil Khāniya, and Kutbu-l-Mulkiya. The settled rule among them was, that if a foreign army entered their country, they united their forces and fought, notwithstanding the dissensions and quarrels they had among themselves. It was also the rule, that when their forces were united, Nizām-ul-Mulk commanded the centre, 'Adil Khan the right, and Kutbu-l-Mulk the left. This rule was now observed, and an immense force had been collected."—Akbar-Nāma, in Elliot, vi. 131.

Impale. Add:

1768-71. "The punishments inflicted at Batavia are excessively severe, especially such as fall upon the Indians. Impalement is the chief and most terrible."—Sturtevant, i. 288.

This writer proceeds to give a description of the horrible process, which he witnessed.

India. The distinct Indias. Add:

India Minor, in Clavijs, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:

1404. "And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Tennit (Termedh), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now it belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Tamurbec."—Clavijs, § ciii. (Markham, 119).

India of the Portuguese. Add:

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E. I. C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670. They desire that dungarees (q.v.) may be supplied thence if possible, as "they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Sevajee."—Notes and Extracts, Part I. p. 2.

Indigo. 'Ινδικόν is also applied by Dioscorides to the mineral substance (a variety of the red oxide of iron) called Indian red (F. Adams, Appendix to Dunbar's Lexicon).

Interloper. Add:

1680. "The commissions relating to the Interloper, or private trader, being considered, it is resolved that a notice be fixed up warning all the Inhabitants of the Towne, not, directly or indirectly, to trade, negotiate, aid, assist, countenance, or hold any correspondence, with Captain William Alley or any person belonging to him or his ship without the license of the Honorable Company. Whoever shall offend herein shall answer it at their Perill."—Notes and Extracts, Pt. III., 29.

1683. "May 28. About 9 this morning Mr. Littleton, Mr. Nedham, and Mr. Douglass came to y<sup>e</sup> factory, and being sent for, were asked 'Whether they did now, or ever intended, directly or indirectly, to trade with any Interlopers that shall arrive in the Bay of Bengal?'

"Mr. Littleton answered that 'he did not, nor ever intended to trade with any Interloper.'

"Mr. Nedham answered, 'that at present he did not, but that he came to gett money, and if any such offer should happen, he would not refuse it.'

"Mr. Douglass answered, he did not, nor ever intended to trade with them: but said 'what Estate he should gett here he would not scruple to send it home upon any Interloper.'

"And having given their respective answers they were dismissed."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc., 90-91.

1694. "Whether y<sup>e</sup> souldiers lately sent up hath created any jealousye in y<sup>e</sup> Interlop<sup>r</sup>: or their own Actions or guilt I know not, but they are so cautious y<sup>t</sup> every 2 or 3 bales y<sup>t</sup> are packt they immediately send on board.”—MS. Letter from Edw<sup>d</sup>. Hern at Hugley to the Rt. Worshp<sup>l</sup> Charles Eyre Esq. Agent for Affaires of the Rt. Honble. East India Comp<sup>a</sup>. in Bengall, &c. (9th Sept.). MS. Record in India Office.

c. 1812. “The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon.”—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D. 1881, p. 165.

Itzeboo. Add:

Marsden (Numism. Orient., 814-815) says: “Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0·6 inch long, and 0·3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 21 grs. each. A third more alloyed weighs 2 dwt. 3 grs. only.”

Izam Maluco, n. p. We often find this form in Correa, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J.

Jack. Add in p. 336, col. a, before “Lassen,” a note:

It was, I find, the excellent Rumphius who originated the erroneous identification of the ariena with the plantain.

Jaggery. Add:

In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is so called; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there.

Jagheer. Add ‘hereditary’ as part of the definition.

Jam. Discriminate the word in Gross. as a. and add: The title is probably Biluch originally. There are several Jams in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jam of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea.

b. A nautical measure, Ar. zām,—pl. azwām. This is the word occurring in the form Geme in a MS. letter of 1614 in the India Office, quoted under Jask. The word was there not recognised, but I have since met with other instances of its use, and among others repeated examples in passages from the Mohit of Sidi ‘Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which I had strangely overlooked.

It would appear from James Prinsep’s remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep:

. . . Prinsep then elucidates this: The zām in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar. Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, zām is possibly a corruption. Again, the isāba’ or inch, and the zām or  $\frac{1}{8}$  of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi ‘Ali’s book that the isāba’ was very nearly equal to 96’ and the zām to 12’. Prinsep had also found on inquiry among Arab mariners, that the term zām was still well known to nautical people as  $\frac{1}{8}$  of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J. A. S. B., v. 642-3).

1013. “J’ai déjà parlé de Sérira (read Sarbaza) qui est située à l’extrémité de l’île de Lâmeri, à cent-vingt zâmâ de Kala.”—Ajâib-al-Hind, ed. Van der Lipp et Marcel Devic, 176.

“Un marin m’a rapporté qu’il avait fait la traversée de Sérira (Sarbaza) à la Chine dans un Samboug (see Sambook). Nous avions parcouru, dit-il, un espace de cinquante zâmâ, lorsqu’une tempête fondit sur notre embarcation. . . . Ayant fait de l’eau, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Senf, suivant ses instructions, et nous y abordâmes sains et saufs, après un voyage de quinze zâmâ.”—Id., pp. 190-91.

1554. "26th VOYAGE from Calicut to Kardafun" (i.e. Gardafui).

"... you run from Calicut to Kolfaini (i.e. Kalpeni, one of the Laccadive Ids.) land, till in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zāms W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degree channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fūl, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardafūn."

"27th VOYAGE, from Diū to Malacca.

"Leaving Diū you go first S.S.E. till the pole is 5 inches, and side then towards the land, till the distance between it and the ship is six zāms; from thence you steer S.S.E. . . . you must not side all at once but by degrees, first till the farkadain (β and γ in the Little Bear) are made by a quarter less than 8 inches, from thence to S.E. till the farkadain are 7½ inches, from thence true east at a rate of 18 zāms, then you have passed Ceylon."—The Mohit, in J. A. S. B., v. 465.

The meaning of this last routier is: "Steer S.S.E. till you are in 8° N. Lat. (lat. of Cape Comorin); make then a little more easting, but keep 72 miles between you and coast of Ceylon till you find the β and γ of Ursa Minor have an altitude of only 12° 24' (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5°), and then steer due east. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon."

1625. "We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 gīam. Gīam is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every gīam is equal to 3 leagues; inasmuch that from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 leagues."—P. delta Valle, ii. 816.

James and Mary. Add:

This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

Jamma, s. Pers. H. jāma, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see pyjammās. Also, stuff for clothing, etc., e.g., moni-jāma, wax-cloth.

Jancada, s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhats of Guzerat. The word is Malayālam, chanīṇḍam (i.e., changṇḍam), with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, 'a raft.' These jancadas or jangulus seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1543. "This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangades because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodes, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the King changes them and appoints others."—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610. "I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him those Jangai, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. . . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs."—Pyrrard de Laval, ch. xxv.

1672. "The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Giancadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Giancadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers. . . ."
—P. Vincenzo Maria, 127.

See also Chungathum, in Burton's Goa, p. 198.

Jangar. Add: The Malayālam is der. by Gundert from Skt. sanghāta, 'closely joined.' It would perhaps have been better to give jangada as the glossarial form.

c. 1793. "Nous nous remîmes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d'un palmier creusé."—Haafner, ii. 77.

Jangomay. Add:

c. 1544. "Out of this Lake of Singapamor . . . do four very large and deep rivers proceed, whereof the first . . . runneth Eastward through all the Kingdoms of Sornau and Siam . . . ; the Second, Jangumaa . . . disimboking into the Sea by the Bar of Martabano in the Kingdom of Pegu . . ."—Pinto (in Cogan, 168).

1612. "The Siamese go out with their heads shaven, and leave long mustachioes on their faces; their garb is much like that of the Peguans. The same may be said of the Jangomas and the Laojoes" (see Lan John).—Couto, V., vi. 1.

Jasoo, s. Ar. Hind. jāsūs, a spy.

1803. "I have some Jasooes, selected by Col. C.—'s brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur in fear. . . .”—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

Jawaub. Add at end:

“In the houses of many chiefs every picture on the walls has its jawab (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawab (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the original in the Darbār room.” (M.-Gen. Keatinge.)

Jeel. Add:

“You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkley, H. M. 32nd Regt, laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . was defended by a post of support called ‘Moir's Picket’ . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a money-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . .”—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15th, 1885.

Jeel and bheel, are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

Jezya. Add:

1686. “Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judgeea lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch.

“Among the orders issued to Pattana, Cosmumbazar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judgeea or Poll-tax, if demanded.”—Fort St. Geo. Cons. (on Tour), Sept. 29 and Oct. 10. Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 49.

Jhoom. Add:

In the Central Provinces the practice is known as dhaia, and has caused great difficulties. In the Philippine Islands it is known as gaingees.

1883. “It is now many years since

* Now M.-Gen. G. Hutchinson, C.B., C.S.I., Sec. to the Ch. Missy. Society.

Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice. . . . The people jumed as before, regardless of orders.”—Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885. “Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. . . .” (Here follows an account of the process).—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, 348 seqq.

Jiggy jiggy, adv. Japanese equivalent for ‘make haste’! (The Chinese syllables chih-chih, given as the origin, mean straight, straight! Qu. ‘right ahead?’) (Bp. Moule.)

John Company. Add:

The term Company is still applied in Sumatra by natives to the existing (Dutch) Government. See H. O. Forbes, Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 204.

1803. (The Nawab) “much amused me by the account he gave of the manner in which my arrival was announced to him. . . . Lord Sahab ka bhūnja, Company ki nawasa teshrif lait,” literally translated, ‘The Lord's sister's son, and the grandson of the Company, has arrived.’”—Lord Valentia, i. 137.

Joss. Add:

1798. “The images which the Chinese worship are called joostje by the Dutch, and joss by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them.”—E. translation of Stavorinus, i. 173.

This is of course quite wrong.

Jowaula mookhee. Add:

1616. “. . . a place called Ialla mokes, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship.”—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1467.

Jowaur. Add:

1760. “En suite mauvais chemin sur des levées faites de boue dans des quarres de Jouari et des champs de Nelis (see Nelly, in Gloss.) remplis d'eau.”—Anguétit du Perron, I. ccclxxxiii.

Judea. Add:

1617. “1 (letter) from Mr. Benjamyn Farry in Judea, at Syam.”—Cocks, i. 272.

Julibdar. Correct: The jilau is properly the cord attached to the bridle of a led horse, and the jilaudâr, the servant who leads it (Blochmann).

c. 1590. The jilaudâr is mentioned as a servant attached to the Imperial stables.—Ain (Bl.), i. 138.

Jumbeea. Add:

1774. "Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, au milieu duquel sur le devant ils passent un couteau large recourbé, et pointu (Jumbeea), dont la pointe est tournée du côté droit."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, 54.

Juncameer. Add:

The word in Wheeler should certainly have been Juncameer.

1680. "The Didwan (?) returned with Lingapas Ruccas (see Roocka) upon the Avaldar at St. Thoma, and upon the two chief Juncameers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming to the Town."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Nov. 22. Notes and Extracts, iii. 39.

1746. "Given to the Governor's Servants, Juncameers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores, 18 Ps. P. 13."—Acct. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. MS. Report, in India Office.

Jungeera. Add:

This State has a port and some land in Kathiawar. Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair."

Jungle. Add:

1848. "Was there ever a battle won like Salamanca? Hey, Dobbin? But where was it he learnt his art? In India, my boy! The jungle is the school for a general, mark me that."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1863, i. 312.

Jungle-terry. Add:

1784. "To be sold . . . that capital collection of Paintings, late the property of A. Cleveland, Esq., deceased, consisting of the most capital views in the districts of Monghyr, Rajemahal, Boglipoor, and the Jungleterry, by Mr. Hodges. . . ."—In Seton-Karr, i. 64.

1817. "These hills are principally covered with wood, excepting where it has been cleared away for the natives to build their villages, and cultivate janaira,* plantains, and yams, which together with some of the small grains mentioned in the account of the Jungleterry, constitute almost the whole of the productions of these hills."—Sutherland's Report on the Hill People (in App. to Long, 560).

Junkeon. Add:

1676. "These practices (claims of per-quisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governour for relief, and chosen rather to pay Juncan than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid."—Major Puckle's Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consn., Feby. 16th. Notes and Extracts, i. 39.

Juribasso. Add:

1603. At Patani the Hollanders having arrived, and sent presents—"ils furent pris par un officier nommé Orankaea Jurebassa, qui en fit trois portions."—In Rec. du Voyages (ed. 1703) ii. 667. See also pp. 672, 675.

K.

Karbaree, s. Hind. Kārbārī, an agent, a manager. Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

1867. "The Lushai Karbaris (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, 293.

Kardar, s. P. H. Kārdār. An agent (of the Government) in Sindh.

Kedgerree, n.p. Add:

1753. "De l'autre côté de l'entré, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Ingeli (see Hidgelee), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipli et celle de Balasor, sont avec Tombati,* rivière mentionné plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange. . . . Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blau, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Ingeli et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Ganga."—D'Anville, p. 66.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under Godavery. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W. just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand fleuve here spoken of. The name Gunga or Old Gunga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Ganga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower."—ii. 3.

Khan, b. Add:

* Janera is the same as Jawâr (see Jowaur).

* See Tumlook in Gloss.

Karbasara dont parle Belon. . .—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 540.

1827. "He lost all hope, being informed by his late fellow-traveller, whom he found at the Khan, that the Nuwaub was absent on a secret expedition."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

Khanum. Add:

1404. "The great wall and tents were for the use of the chief wife of the Lord, who was called Caño, and the other was for the second wife, called Quinchí Caño, which means 'the little lady.'"—Markham's Clavijo, 145.

Khirāj. Add:

Khot, s. This is a Mahrāti word, khot, in use in some parts of Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khoti, and coming under the class legally defined as 'superior holders.'

The position and claims of the khots have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor.

Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwary is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zemindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of this century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the 'Adil Shāhi (see Idalcān) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan he has long been a hereditary zemindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khot to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property.

In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khots were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khots have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have often been exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khot "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti.* This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been" (Candy, pp. 20-21). Khyber Pass, n. p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar.

1519. “Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizer-Khail had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement.”—Baber, p. 277.

Kidderpore, n. p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hoogly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dock-yard. This establishment was formed in the last century by General Kyd, “after whom,” says the Imperial Gazetteer, “the village is named.” This is the general belief, and was mine till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the chart Kitherepore) then occupied the same position, i.e., immediately below “Gobarnapore,” and that immediately below “Chittanutte” (i.e., Govindpūr and Chatānati, see s.v. Chuttanatty).

Killadar. Add:

It may be noticed with reference to kal’a, that this Arabic word is generally represented in Spanish names by Alcala, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnstone’s Index Geographicus; and in Sicilian ones by Calata, e.g., Calatafimi, Caltanissetta, Callagirona.

Kizilbash, s. A name applied to certain tribes of Turks who have become naturalized, as it were, in Persia, and have adopted the Persian language; they are in fact Persianized Turks, like the present royal race and predominant class in Persia. Many are settled in Afghanistan, and several in the Amir's army; some in our own Indian regiments of irregular cavalry. The name, I believe, first became current on the Persian frontier in the time of the early Sophies (q.v.), the name being Kizil-bāsh (T.) 'red-head,' from the tall red caps which they wore.

See Markham, p. 104.

Kotul, s. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotal, a mountain pass, a col.

Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

Kuttaur. Add:

In saying that Ibn Batuta exaggerated the size I spoke too hastily. At least the exaggeration is not nearly so great as I thought, and may have been no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a photo-type of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-84; among them two great katārs, with sheaths made from the snouts of two saw-fishes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26.

There is also a plate in the Indian Antiquary, vii. 193, representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace armoury, among which are katār-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Walhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted katār-fashion were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferara. I add an extract. Mr. Walhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades, in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle.

The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by 'belly piercer.'

1690. "... which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Catarry or Bagonet in his hand he first falls upon those that are near him ... killing and stabbing as he goes ..."—Ovington, 237.

1754. "To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cuttarri) and two swords ..."—H. of Nadir, in Hanway's Travels, ii. 386.

1768-71. "They (the Moguls) on the left side ... wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 457.

1878. "The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as at Srirangam near Trichinapalli, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kuttars or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in later Kuttars, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than  $\frac{1}{2}$  of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding ... and all were so soft as to be easily bent."—Ind. Antiq. vii.

Kuzzanna, s. Ar. Hind. khizāna, or khazāna, a treasury. It is the usual word for the district and general treasures in British India; and khazānchī for the treasurer.

1683. "Ye King's Duan had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year's Tallicas (see Tallica) ... ordering his Peashdast* to see it suddenly paid in ye King's Kuzzanna."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc., 103.

Kyoung, s. Burm. kyauing. A Buddhist monastery. The term is not employed by Padre Sangermano, who uses Bao, a word, he says, used by the Portuguese in India (p. 88). I cannot explain it.

* Peashdast, an assistant.

1799. "The kioums or convents of the Rhahaans are different in their structure from common houses, and much resemble the architecture of the Chinese; they are made entirely of wood; the roof is composed of different stages, supported by strong pillars," etc.—Symes, p. 210.

Lack. Add:

1747. "The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lacreative (sic) Disposition, and ... are so exceedingly avaritious, occasioned by the large Proffers they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them."—Letter from Fort St. David to the Court, May 2d (MS. Records in India Office).

Lamasery, Lamaserie, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. missionaries, for a Lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and serai) but is a factitious French word analogous to nonnerie, vacherie, laiterie, etc.

Lāṭ and Lāth, s. This word, meaning a staff or pole, is used for an obelisk or columnar monument; and is specifically used for the ancient Buddhist columns of Eastern India.

Law-officer. This was the official designation of a Mahommedan officer learned in the (Mahommedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' courts in the districts, as well as of the Sudder or courts of Review at the Presidency.

It is to be remembered that the law administered in courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahommedan law; at first by the hands of native Kāzis and Muftis, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence, which, undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallis's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793 (see Adawlut, in SUPPR.). The Mahommedan Law continued, however, to be the professed basis of criminal jurisprudence, though modified more and more, as years went on, by new Regulations, and by the recorded constructions and circular orders of the superior courts, until the accomplishment of the great changes which followed the Mutiny, and the assumption of the direct government of India by the Crown (1858). The landmarks of change were (a) the enactment of the Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), and (b) that of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act XXV. of 1861), followed by (c) the establishment of the High Court (1st July, 1862), in which became merged both the Supreme Court with its peculiar jurisdiction, and the (quondam-Company's) Sudder Courts of Review and Appeal, civil and criminal (Dewanny Adawlat, and Nizamut Adawlat).

The authoritative exposition of the Mahommedan Law, in aid and guidance of the English judges, was the function of the Mahommedan Law-officer. He sat with the judge on the bench at Sessions, i.e., in the hearing of criminal cases committed by the magistrate for trial; and at the end of the trial he gave in his written record of the proceedings with his futwa (q.v.)* which was his judgment as to the guilt of the accused, as to the definition of the crime, and as to its appropriate punishment according to Mahommedan Law. The judge was bound attentively to consider the futwa, and if it seemed to him to be consonant with natural justice, and also in conformity with the Mahommedan Law, he passed sentence (save in certain excepted cases) in its terms, and issued his warrant to the magistrate for execution of the sentence, unless it were one of death, in which case the proceedings had to be referred to the Sudder Nizamut for confirmation.

In cases also where there was disagreement between the civilian judge and the Law-officer, either as to finding or sentence, the matter was referred to the Sudder Court for ultimate decision.

In 1832 certain modifications were introduced by law,† which declared that the futwa might be dispensed with either by referring the case for report to a punchayet (q.v.), which sat apart from the court; or by constituting assessors in the trial (generally three in number). The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old standing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the mool-vee (maulavi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any circular of the Sudder Nizamut; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Rungpore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus :

* See Regn. IX., 1793, sect. 47.

† Regn. VI. of that year.

"The Moulvee-ship . . . must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny; for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moulvee, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Rungpore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moulvees in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Karr again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes :

"I am quite certain of my own practice . . . and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed and came into operation, I wished to get rid of futwas and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect to civil litigation, it had been especially laid down† that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, marriage, caste, and all religious usages and institutions, the Mahomedan laws with respect to Mahomedans, and the Hindū laws with respect to Hindūs, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahomedan and Hindū law-officers of the court were to attend and to expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahomedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahomedan law. The Hindū law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down at least to 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (see quotation under Cazee in SUPPT.) abolishing Law-officers. But in many of the districts it would seem that he had very long before 1860 practically ceased to exist, under what circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Moolvee is attached to the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench.

It need only be added that, under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the Law-officer* of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character.

The designation in Hindustani of the Law-officer was Maulavi. See Adawlut, Cazee, Futwa, Mufy, all in SUPPT.

1780. "That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahomedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentoos, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahmins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the [decree]."—Regulation passed by the G.-G. and Council, 11th April, 1780.

1793. "II. The Law Officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Nizamut Adawlut, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the zillah and city courts . . . shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct. . . ."—Reg. XII. of 1793.

In §§ iv., v., vi. Cauzy and Mufy are substituted for Law Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1799. "IV. If the futwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahomedan law on the ground of . . . the Court of Nizamut Adawlut shall notwithstanding * Reg. I. of 1810 had empowered the executive government, by an official communication from its secretary in the Judicial Department, to dispense with the attendance and futwa of the Law officers of the courts of circuit, when it seemed advisable. But in such case the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamut Adawlut.

Laximana, Laquesimena, etc., s. Malay Laksamana, from the Skt. lakshmana, ‘having fortunate tokens,’ (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Rama). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces :

1511. “There used to be in Malaca five principal dignities . . . the third is Lassamane; this is Admiral of the Sea . . .”—Alboquerque, by Birch, iii. 87.

c. 1539. “The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Sails . . . And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemena, his Admiral, of whose Valor the History of the Indias hath spoken in divers places.”—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 38.

1553. “Lacsamana was harassed by the King to engage Dom Garcia; but his reply was: Stre, against the Portuguese and their high-sided vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut lancharas like ours. Leave me (to act) for I know this people well, seeing how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with thee, and I am about to avenge you on them. And so he did.”—Barros, III. viii. 7.

Leaguer, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. ‘beer for laying down, for keeping’ (primarily in cask).

The word in this sense is neither in Minshew (1627), nor in Bayley (1730).

1827. “Every royal edict requires by law, or rather by usage, the sanction of this council: indeed, the King’s name never appears in any edict or proclamation, the acts of the Lut-d'hau being in fact considered his acts."—Crawford's Journal, 401.

Loutea. Add:

1618. "The China Capt. had letters this day per way of Xaxma (Satsuma) . . . that the letters I sent are received by the noblemen in China in good parte, and a mandarin, or loytea, appointed to com for Japon. . . ."—Cocks, ii. 44.

Lucknow, n. p. Properly Lakh-nau; the well-known capital of the Nawābs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877.

1528. "On Saturday the 29th of the latter Jemādi, I reached Luknow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gumti and encamped."—Baber, p. 381.

1663. "In Agra the Hollanders have also an House. . . . Formerly they had a good trade there in selling Scarlet . . . as also in buying those cloths of Jelapour and Laknau, at 7 or 8 days journey from Agra, where they also keep an house. . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 94.

Lugow, To, v. This is one of those imperative transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under puckerow, buwōw. H. inf. lagā-nā, imperative lagā-o. The meanings of lagānā, as given by Shakespear, are: "To apply, close, attach, join, fix, affix, ascribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, plaster, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice"—in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lugow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagānā is the active form of the neuter verb lag-nā, 'to touch, lie, be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagānā expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lag-nā, active lagānā, we have a secondary causal verb, lagwānā, 'to cause to apply,' etc. Lag-nā, lagā-nā, are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A. S. līegan and legan, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespear gives of lagā-nā.

Lungoor. Add:

1859. "I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whisker."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, p. 49.

M.

Mā-bāp, s. ' Āp mā-bāp hai khudāwān! ' 'You, my Lord, are my mother and father!' This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young ṣāhib hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

Mabar. Add:

1753. "Selon cet autorité le pays du continent qui fait face à l'île de Ceilan est Maabar, ou la grande Inde: et cette interpretation de Marc-Pol est autant plus juste, que maha est un terme Indien, et propre même à quelques langues Scythiques ou Tartares, pour signifier grand. Ainsi, Maa-bar signifie la grande region."—D'Anville, p. 105.

The great Geographer is wrong!

Macao. Add:

1599. See in SUPPL. under Monsoon.

1615. "He adviseth me that 4 junks are arrived at Langasaque from Chancheu, which with this ship from Amacau, will cause all matters to be sould chepe."—Cocks, i. 35.

Macareo. Add, at p. 403, after quotation ending "African wilderness: "

Take also the following:

1885. "Here at his mouth Father Meghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement. . . . In deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling billow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, pp. 161-2.

Macheen. Add under Chin and Machin:

c. 1665. "In the first place you have taught me, that all that Frangistan . . . was nothing, but I know not what little Island, of which the greatest King was he of Portugal . . . telling me that the Kings of Indostan were far above them altogether, and that they were the only true and only Houmajons . . . the great ones, the Conquerors and Kings of the World; and that Persia and Usbec, Kachguer, Tartar and Catay, Pegu, China, and Matchina, did tremble at the name of the Kings of Indostan: Admirable Geography!"—Speech of Aurangzeb to his Tutor, according to Bernier, E. T., 48.

Madremaluco, n. p. The name given by the Portuguese to the Mahomedan dynasty of Berar, called 'Imād-shāhā. The Portuguese name represents the title of the founder 'Imād-ul-Mulk ('Pillar of the State'), otherwise Fath Ullah 'Imād Shāh. The dynasty was the most obscure of those founded upon the dissolution of the Bahmani monarchy in the Deccan. See Nizamaluco, Sabaio, Hidalcan, Cotamaluco and Melique Verido.

It began about 1484, and in 1572 was merged in the kingdom of Ahmednagar.

There is another Madremaluco (or 'Imād-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shāh (1526) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correa, iii. 272, 344, etc.; Couto, Decs. v. and vi. passim).

1553. "The Madre Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalcan, and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Meleque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV., vii. 1.

1563. "The Imademaluco or Madremaluco, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cherques) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546. . . . Imad is as much as to say 'prop,' and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imadmaluco, or 'Prop of the Kingdom' . . ."—Garcia, f. 36 v.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of Imād-ul-Mulk's Circassian origin, agree with those of Firishita. The latter says that Fath-Ullah 'Imād Shāh was descended from the heathen of Bijanagar (iii. 485).

Magadoxo. Add:

1505. "And the Viceroy (Don Francisco D'Almeida) made sail, ordering the course to be made for Magadoxo, which he had instructions also to make tributary. But the pilots objected, saying that they would miss the season for crossing to India, as it was already the 26th of August. . . ."—Correa, i. 560.

Mahájun. Add:

1885. "The Mahajun hospitably entertains his victim, and speeds his homeward departure, giving no word or sign of his business till the time for appeal has gone by, and the decree is made absolute. Then the storm bursts on the head of the luckless hill-man, who finds himself loaded with an overwhelming debt, which he has never incurred, and can never hope to discharge; and so he becomes practically the Mahajun slave for the rest of his natural life."—Lt. Col. T. Lewin, p. 339.

Mahout. Add:

It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahā-mātra, in the sense of a high officer, in Hesychius:

"Μαμάτραι, οἱ στρατηγοὶ παρ' Ἰνδοῖς."—Hesych. s.v.

Mahratta. Add:

1747. "Agreed on the arrival of these Ships that We take Five Hundred (500) Peons more into our Service, that the 50 Moratta Horses be augmented to 100 as We found them very usefull in the last Skirmish. . . ."—Consn. at Fort St. David, Jan. 8th (MS. Record in India Office).

1748. "That upon his hearing the Mirattoes had taken Tanner's Fort . . ."—In Long, p. 5.

Mahratta Ditch. Add:

1757. "That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Marattes; also 600 yards without it, for an Esplanade."—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Clive (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 14th). In Memoirs of the Revolution in Bengal, 1760, p. 89.

1782. "To the Proprietors and Occupiers of Houses and other Tenements within the Mahratta Entrenchment."—India Gazette, Aug. 10th.

Maistry, Mestry. Add, before quotations:

Mastēr (Μαρετρ) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives.

There is too a similar word in modern Greek, μαγιστρος.

1404. "And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and azure and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; inasmuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maestros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see."—Clavijo, § cv. (Comp. Markham, p. 125).

1524. "And the Viceroy (D. Vasco da Gama) sent to seize in the river of the Culymutys four newly-built caturis, and fetched them to Cochim. These were built very light for fast rowing, and were greatly admired. But he ordered them to be burned, saying that he intended to show the Moors that we knew how to build better caturis than they did; and he sent for Mestre Vyne the Genoese, whom he had brought to build galleys, and asked him if he could build boats that would row faster than the Malabar paraos. He answered: 'Sir, I'll build you brigantines fast enough to catch a mosquito.' . . ."—Correa, ii. 830.

Malabar, b. Add, under B:

1680. "Whereas it hath been hitherto accustomed at this place to make sales and alienations of houses in writing in the Portuguese, Gentue, and Malabar languages, from which some inconveniences have arisen. . . ."—Port St. Geo. Consn., Sept. 9th, in Notes and Extracts, No. III., 33.

Malabar Hill, n. p. This favourite site of villas on Bombay Island is stated by Mr. Whitworth to have acquired its name from the fact that the Malabar pirates, who haunted this coast, used to lie behind it.

Maladoo, s. Chicken maladoo is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu. It looks like a corruption from the French cuisine, but of what?

Mamlutdar, s. P. H. mu'āmalatdār (from Ar. mu'āmalā, 'affairs, business'), and in Mahr. nāmlatdār. Chiefly used in Western India. Formerly it was the designation, under various native governments, of the chief civil officer of a district, and is now in the Bombay Presidency the title of a native civil officer in charge of a tāluka, corresponding nearly to the tahsildār of a pergunna in the Bengal Presidency, but of a status somewhat more important. See a quotation under Patel.

Mandarin. Add:

1682. In the Kingdom of Patane (on east coast of Malay Peninsula) "The King's counsellors are called Mentary."—Nieuwhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 64.

Mangalore, b. Add:

1536. "... For there was come another catur with letters, in which the Captain of Diu urgently called for help; telling how the King (of Cambay) had equipped large squadrons in the Ports of the Gulf . . . alleging . . . that he was sending them to Mangalor to join others in an expedition against Sinde . . . and that all this was false, for he was really sending them in the expectation that the Rumis would come to Mangalor next September. . . ."—Correa, iv. 701.

1648. This place is called Mangerol by Van Twist, p. 13.

Mangelin. Add:

On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's Coins of Southern India, now in the press. The mānjadī was the hard scarlet seed of the Adenanthera pavonina, L., used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4·13 grs. 3 parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5·02 and 5·03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1584. "There is another sort of weight called Mangiallino, which is 5 graines of Venice weight, and therewith they weigh diamants and other jewels."—Barret, in Hakluyt, ii. 409.

Manjee.

1683. "We were forced to track our boat till 4 in the Afternoon, when we saw a great black cloud arise out of ye North with much lightning and thunder, which made our Mangee or Steerman advise us to fasten our boat in some Creeke."—Hedges, Hak. Soc., 88.

For the Pahāri use, see Long's Selections, p. 561.

Martaban, n.p. Add:

1680. "That the English may settle factorys at Serian, Pegu, and Ava . . . and alsoe that they may settle a factory in like manner at Mortavan. . ."—Articles to be proposed to the King of Burma and Pegu, in Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 8.

1695. "Concerning Bartholomew Rodrigues . . . I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place."—Governor Higginson, in Datr. Oriental Repert. ii. 342-3.

Marwāree, n. p. and s. This word Mārwarī, properly a man of Mārwar or the Jodhpūr country in Rājputānā, is used in many parts of India as synonymous with banya or sowcar, from the fact that many of the traders and money-lenders have come originally from Mārwar, most frequently Jains in religion. Compare the lombard of medieval England, and the caorsino of Dante's time.

Masulipatam. Add:

1684. "These sort of Women are so nimble and active that when the present king went to see Maslipatam, nine of them undertook to represent the figure of an Elephant; four making the four feet, four the body, and one the trunk; upon which the King, sitting in a kind of Throne, made his entry into the City."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 65.

Matross. Add:

1745. "... We were told with regard to the Fortifications, that no Expense should be grudged that was necessary for the Defence of the Settlement, and in 1741, a Person was sent out in the character of an Engineer for our Place; but . . . he lived not to come among us; and therefore, we could only judge of his Merit and Qualifications by the Value of his Stipend, Six Pagodas a Month, or about Eighteen Pence a Day, scarce the Pay of a common Matross. . ."—Letter from Mr. Barnett to the Secret Committee, in Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co., p. 45.

Mayla, s. Hind. melā, a fair, almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the mediæval fairs in Europe. The word is from Skt. mela, 'meeting, course, assembly.'

1869. "Le Mela n'est pas précisément une foire telle que nous l'entendons; c'est le nom qu'on donne aux réunions de pèlerins et des marchands qui . . . se rendent dans les lieux considérés comme sacrés, aux fêtes de certains dieux indiens et des personnages réputés saints parmi les musulmans."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 27.

Meckly, n. p. See under Munneepore.

Melique Verido, n. p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 15th century, on the decay of the Bahmani kingdom. The name represents 'Malik Barid.' It was apparently only the 3rd of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of ('Ali) Barid Shāh.

1533. "And as the folosomia (?) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Yzam Maluco (see Nizamaluco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Decanin, that lies between the Balgat and Cambaya) . . . that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions."—Correa, iii. 514.

1563. "And these regents . . . concerted among themselves . . . that they should seize the King of Daquem in Beder, which is the chief city and capital of the Decan; so they took him and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salām (çalema) at certain days of the year . . . The Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian, as I have heard on sure authority."—Garcia, f. 35 and 35v.

c. 1601. "About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultán Dániyál, reporting that (Malik) Ambar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid."—Incizyat Ullah, in Elliot, vi. 104.

Milk-bush. Add:

c. 1590. "They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the zekoom (zak-kum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Gladwin, ii. 68.

This is the milk-hedge.

"The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charcoal from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

1879. "So saying, Buddh Silently laid aside sandals and staff, His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand, . . ."

E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

Mincopie, n. p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lieut. Colebrooke in volume iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained.

Miscall, s. Arab. miškāl (mithkāl, properly). An Arabian weight, originally that of the Roman aureus and the gold dinār; about 73 grs.

c. 1340. "The prince, violently enraged, caused this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mithkals of gold. This anecdote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shihābuddin, in Not. et Ext., xiii. 192.

1502. "Upon which the King (of Sofala) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call pingo, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 reis, and gave for the King another that weighed 3000 maticals. . ."—Correa, i. 274.

Mocuddum. Add:

1680. "For the better keeping the Boatmen in order, resolved to appoint Black Tom Muckadum or Master of the Boatmen, being Christian as he is, his wages being paid at 70 fanams per mensem."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Dec. 23, in Notes and Extracts, No. III. p. 42.

Mogul. Add:

1404. "And the territory of this empire of Samarkand is called the territory of Mogalia, and the language thereof is called Mugalia, and they don't understand this language on this side of the River (the Oxus) . . . for the character which is used by those of Samarkand beyond the river is not understood or read by those on this side the river; and they call that character

Mongali, and the Emperor keeps by him certain scribes who can read and write this Mogali character."—Claviño, § ciii. (Comp. Markham, 119-120).

1781. "Wanted an European or Mogul Coachman that can drive four Horses in hand."—India Gazette, June 30.

Mogul, The Great. Add:

1653. "This Prince, having taken them all, made fourscore and two of them abjure their faith, who served him in his wars against the Great Mogor, and were every one of them miserably slain in that expedition."—Cogan's Pinto, p. 25.

The expression is not in Pinto's original, where it is Rey dos Mogores (cap. xx.).

c. 1663. "Since it is the custom of Asia never to approach Great Persons with Empty Hands, when I had the Honour to kiss the Vest of the Great Mogol Aureng Zebe, I presented him with Eight Roupees. . . ."—Bernier, E. T., p. 62.

1807. "L'Hindoustan est depuis quelque temps dominé par un multitude de petits souverains qui s'arrachent l'un l'autre leurs possessions. Aucun d'eux ne reconnaît comme il faut l'autorité légitime du Mogol, si ce n'est cependant messieurs les Anglais, lesquels n'ont pas cessé d'être soumis à son obéissance; en sorte qu'actuellement, c'est à dire en 1222 (1807) ils reconnaissent l'autorité suprême d'Akbar Schah, fils de Schah Alam."—Afsos, Arāyish-i-mahjil, quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., 90.

Mohur, Gold. Add:

1779. "I then took hold of his hand: then he (Francis) took out gold mohurs, and offered to give them to me: I refused them; he said 'Take that (offering both his hand to me), 'twill make you great man, and I will give you 100 gold mohurs more.'"—Evidence of Rambux Jemadar, on Trial of Grand v. Francis, quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 228.

Mohwa. Add:

"It abounds in Guzerat. When the flowers are falling the Hill-men camp under the trees to collect them. And it is a common practice to sit perched on one of the trees in order to shoot the large deer which come to feed on the fallen mhowa. The timber is strong and durable."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

Moluccas. Add:

The earliest mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespucci (quoted under Canhameira), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral's fleet, mentions the Maluche Islands.

1518. "And as it was the monsoon for Maluco, dom Aleixo despatched dom Tristram de Meneses thither, to establish the trade in clove, carrying letters from the King of Portugal, and presents for the Kings of the isles of Ternate and Tidore where the clove grows."—Correa, ii. 552.

Mone, n. p. Mōn or Mān, the name by which the people who formerly occupied Pegu, and whom we call Talaing, called themselves. See Talaing.

Monegar. Add:

1800. "In each Hobly, for every thousand Pagodas (335*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*) rent that he pays, there is also a Munegar, or a Tahsildar as he is called by the Mussulmans."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., i. 276.

Monsoon. Add:

1599. "Ora nell anno 1599, essendo venuta la Mansone a proposito, si messero alla vela due navi Portoghesi, le quali eran venute dalla città di Goa in Amacao."—Carletti, ii. 206.

Mooktear. Add:

1885. "The wily Bengali muktears, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, p. 336.

Moollah. Add:

1680. "The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cozzee Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per mensem, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c. in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company's servants as shall desire to learn it."—Fort St. Geo. Consn. March 11th. Notes and Extracts, No. III. p. 12.

Moolvee. See Law-officer in SUPPT.

Moon Blindness. This affection of the eyes is commonly believed to be produced by sleeping exposed to the full light of the moon. There is great difference of opinion as to the facts, some quoting experience as incontrovertible, others regarding the thing merely as a vulgar prejudice, without substantial foundation. Some remarks will be found in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 308-310. The present writer has in the East twice suffered from a peculiar affection of the eyes and face, after being in sleep exposed to a bright moon, but he would hardly have used the term moon-blindness.

Moonga, Mooga. Add:

1680. "The Floretta yarn or Muckta examined and priced. . . . The Agent informed 'that 'twas called Arundee, made neither with cotton nor silke, but of a kind of Herba spun by a worme that feeds upon the leaves of a stalke or tree called Arundee, which bears a round prickly berry, of which oyle is made; vast quantitys of this cloth is made in the country about Goora Ghaut beyond Seripore Mercha; where the wormes are kept as silke wormes here; twill never come white, but will take any colour,' etc."—Fort St. Geo. Agent on Tour, Consn., Nov. 19th. In Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 58.

Arandi or rendi is the castor-oil plant, and this must be the Attacus ricini, Jones, called in H. Arrindi, Arrindiariva (?), and in Bengali Eri, Eria, Erindy, according to Forbes Watson's Nomenclature, No. 8002, p. 371.

Moonshee. Add:

1782. "The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating . . . they reason and dispute with their munchees (tutors) in Persian and Moors. . . ."—Price's Tracts, i. 89.

Moor. Add, at foot of p. 445, col. b:

Moro is still applied at Manilla to the Musulman Malays.

1648. "King Jangier (Jehāngir) used to make use of a reproach: That one Portugees was better than three Moors, and one Hollander or Englishman better than two Portugees."—Van Twist, 59.

1747. "We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success chiefly depended on the assistance of the Moors, We were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from Fort St. David to the Court, May 2nd (India Office MS. Records).

1797. "Under the head of castes entitled to a favourable term, I believe you comprehend Brahmans, Moormen, merchants, and almost every man who does not belong to the Sudra or cultivating caste. . . ."—Minute of Sir T. Munro, in Arbuthnot, i. 17.

Moorpunky. Add:

1767. "Charges Dewanny, viz. :—

"A few moorpunkys and beauleahs for the service of Mahomed Reza Khan, and on the service at the city some are absolutely necessary . . . 25,000 : 0 : 0."—Dacca Accounts, in Long, 524.

Moors. Add:

1779. "C. What language did Mr. Francis speak?

W. (Meerun Kitmutgar). The same as I do, in broken Moors."
Trial of Grand v. Philip Francis, quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 226.

1803. "Conceive what society there will be when people speak what they don't think, in Moors."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 108.

Mora. Add:

The typical form of the cane mora is that of two truncated cones meeting at the smaller ends.

"The ordinary mora" (of the form just stated) "was in Assam so universally in use as a stand, that, when tea cultivation began, the typical form was adopted for tea-firing, and thousands of iron moras were employed. The sieve with the tea-leaves to be fired stood on the top, and the charcoal fire burned in the bottom."—(M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.)

Mort-de-chien. Add, after quotation from Johnson, at top of p. 451, col. b:

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned at p. 451, col. b, after Macpherson:

1780. "I am once or twice a year (!) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien. . . ."—Impey to Dunning, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 339.

1781. "The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons, 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

Mosque. Add:

1680. Consn. Fort St. Geo., March 28: "Records the death of Cassa Verona . . . and a dispute arising as to whether his body should be burned by the Gentues or buried by the Moors, the latter having stopped the procession on the ground that the deceased was a Musselman and built a Musset in the Towne to be buried in, the Governor with the advice of his Council sent order that the body should be burned as a Gentue, and not buried by the Moors, it being apprehended to be of dangerous consequence to admit the Moors such pretences in the Towne."—Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 14.

Mucoa. Add:

1677. Resolved "to raise the rates of hire of the Mesullas (see Mussoola) boatmen called Macquars."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Jan. 12th, in Notes and Extracts, No. I., 54.

1746. "194 Macquars attending the seaside at night . . . . (P.) 8 : 8 : 40."—Account of Extraordinary Expenses, at Fort St. David (India Office MS. Records).

Mufti, s. a. Ar. Muftī, an expounder of the Mahomedan Law, the utterer of the fatwā. Properly the Mufti is above the Kāzī, who carries out the judgment.

In the last century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganisation which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Cauzies and Mufties as authorised expounders of the Mahomedan law; but, though Kāzis were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Kāzis became limited to quite different objects, and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the futwa in our District courts was Maulawī. The title Muftī has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. See in SUPPT. Cazee and Law-officer.

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure.

1653. "Pendant la tempeste vne femme Industani mourut sur notre bord; vn Moufti Persan de la Sete des Schah assista à cette dernière extrémité, luy donnant esperance d'une meilleure vie que celle-cy, et d'un Paradis, où l'on auroit tout ce que l'on peut desirer. . . . et la fit changer de Sete. . . ."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 281.

1674. "Resolve to make a present to the Governors of Changulaput and Pallaveram, old friends of the Company, and now about to go to Golcondah, for the marriage of the former with the daughter of the King's Mufti or Churchman."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., March 26th. In Notes and Extracts, No. 1., 30.

1767. "3d. You will not let the Cauzy or Mufty receive anything from the tenants unlawfully."—Collectors' Instructions, in Long, 511.

1777. "The Cazi and Muftis now deliver in the following report, on the right of inheritance claimed by the widow and nephew of Shabaz Beg Khan. . . ."—Report on the Patna Cause, quoted in Stephen's Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 167.

1793. "§ XXXVI. The cauzies and Muftis of the provincial Courts of Appeal, shall also be cauzies and mufties of the courts of circuit in the several divisions, and shall not be removable, except on proof to the satisfaction of the Governor-General in Council that they are incapable, or have been guilty of misconduct. . . ."—Reg. IX. of 1793.

Muggrabee. Add:

From Ar. gharb, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province

Algarve, and both Spanish and Italian have garbin, a west wind.

Muncheel. Add:

1844. "Muncheels, with poles complete

. . . . Poles, Muncheel, Spare."

Jameson's Bombay Code, Ordinance Nomenclature.

"When I landed at Diu, an officer met me with a Muncheel for my use, viz. a hammock slung to a pole, and protected by an awning."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

Munneepore, in p. Properly Manipūr; a quasi-independent state lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the kingdom of Burma, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Irawadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongoloid aspect, and the state, small and secluded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the states of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese states, too, Manipur has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rajas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipur by Alompra, founder of the present Burmese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoy was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipur. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmese war (1824-25), when the country was overrun by the Burmese, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipuri force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipur, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipur.

This state has been called by a variety of names, causing much confusion. Thus, in Rennell's Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Meckley. In Symes's Narrative, and in maps of that period it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Meckley represents the name (Makli ?) by which the country was known in Assam; Mogli (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Ka-sé or Ka-thé (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shans or Burmese.

1755. "I have carried my Arms to the confines of CHINA . . . on the other quarter I have reduced to my subjection the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay; whose Heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you . . ."—Speech of Alompra to Capt. Baker at Monchabue. Dalrymple, Or. Rep., i. 152.

1759. "Cassay, which . . . lies to the N. Westward of AVA, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unheard of in Europe . . ."—Letter, dd. 22 June, 1759, in Id. 116.

1763. "Meckley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Cookie Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East" by the Burampoota; beyond the Hills, to the North by Asam and Poong; to the West Cashar; to the South and East the BURMAH Country, which lies between Meckley and China . . . The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Poong, into two large branches, one of which passes through ASAM, and down by the way of Dacca, the other through POONG into the Burma Country."—Act. of Meckley, by Nerher Doss Gosseen, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep., ii. 477-478.

" . . . there is about seven days plain country between Moneypoor and Burampoota, after crossing which, about seven days, Jungle and Hills, to the inhabited border of the Burmah country."—Ibid. 481.

1793. " . . . The first ridge of mountains towards Thibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley . . . The space between Bengal and China, is occupied by the province of Meckley, and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava . . ."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799. (Referring to 1757). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months . . . he took up arms against the Cassayers . . . Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munneepoor, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguers had revolted . . ."—Symes, Narrative, 41-42.

"All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Birmans."—Id. 318.

1819. "Beyond the point of Negraglia (i.e. Negrails), as far as Azen (Assam), and even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aracan and Cassé from the Burmese . . ."—Sangermano, p. 33.

1827. "The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Burmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Lao, the Cassay, or more correctly Kathé . . ."—Crawford's Journal, 372.

1855. "The wearing of these silks . . . gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Munni-poorians, or Kathé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"These people, the descendants of unfortunatees who were carried off in droves from their country by the Burmans in the time of King Mentaragyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion . . . of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the districts of Central Burma . . . Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if boats have to be manned they furnish the rowers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remuneration they may receive is very scanty and uncertain."—Mission to Ava, 153-154.

Musk-Rat. Add:

1653. "Les rats d'Inde sont de deux sortes . . . La deuxiesme espee que les Portugais appellent cheroso ou odoriferant est de la figure d'un furet" (a ferret), "mais extremement petit, sa morseure est veneneuse. Lorsqu'il entre en une chambre l'on le sent incontinent, et l'on l'entend crier krik, krik, krik."—De la Boullage-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 256.

I may note on this that Jerdon says of the Sorex murinus,—the large musk-rat of China, Burma, and the Malay countries, extending into Lower Bengal and Southern India, especially the Malabar coast, where it is said to be the common species (therefore probably that known to our author),—that the bite is considered venomous by the natives (Mammals, p. 54).

Musnud. Add:

1757. "On the 29th the Colonel went to the Soubah's Palace, and in presence of all the Rajahs and great men of the court, led him to the Musland . . ."—Reflexions by Luke Scrafton, Esq., ed. 1770, p. 93.

1827. "The Prince Tippoo had scarcely dismounted from his elephant, and occupied the musnud, or throne of cushions."—W. Scott, Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

Mussaulchee. Add:

"In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nāi) to carry the torch; hence nāi, commonly, = 'torch-bearer'" (M.-Gen. Keatinge).

* Here the Kyendwen R. is regarded as a branch of the Brahmaputra. See further on.

Mussoola. Add:

1678. Three Englishmen drowned by upsetting of a Mussoola boat. The fourth on board saved by the help of the Muckwas (see Mucca above, and in GLOSS.).—Ft. St. Geo. Consm., Aug. 13. Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 78.

1679. "A Mussoolee being overturned, although it was very smooth water and no surf, and one Englishman being drowned, a Dutchman being with difficulty recovered, the Boatmen were seized and put in prison, one escaping."—Ibid., July 14. In No. II., p. 16.

Musteess. Add:

1653. (At Goa) "Les Mestissos sont de plusieurs sortes, mais fort mesprisez des Reinois et Castissos (Castees), parce qu'il y a eu vn peu de sang noir dans la generation de leurs ancestres . . . la tache d'avoir eu pour ancestre une Indienne leur demeure jusques à la centiesme generation: ils peuent toutesfois estre soldats et Capitaines de fortresses ou de vaisseaux, s'ils font profession de suiure les armes, et s'ils se iettent du costé de l'Eglise ils peuent estre Lecteurs, mais non Prouvinciaux."—De la Bouillaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 226.

1678. "Noe Roman Catholick or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear any office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 fanams per mensem as private centinalls, and the pay of those of the Portuguez nation, as Europeans, Musteesses, and Topasees, is from 70 to 40 fanams per mensem."—Articles and Orders . . . of Fort St. Geo., Madraspatam. In Notes and Extracts, i. 88.

1781. "Eloped from the service of his Mistress a Slave Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of Musty, tall and slender."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799. "August 13th . . . Visited by appointment . . . Mrs. Carey, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole at Calcutta. . . This lady, now fifty-eight years of age, as she herself told me, is . . . of a fair Mesticia colour . . . She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said. . . ."—Note by Thomas Boileau; * quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 34.

1868. "These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perhaps been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people . . . and have their own places of amusement . . . and Mestiza balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, p. 296.

Muster. Add:

1772. "The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price's Travels, i. 39.

Muxadabad. Add:

1684. "Dec. 26.—In ye morning I went to give Bulchund a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muxoodavad. . . ."—Hedges, p. 59.

1753. "En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Mocsudabad. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnoie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe celle du pays; et un grand fauxbourg de cette ville, appelé Azingonge, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement."—D'Anville, 63.

It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that "Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Moorshedabad." But there is no ground for this statement. It does not appear, so far as I can trace, that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagore, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hoogly even was the Bridge-water of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

Muzbee. Add, before quotations:

The original corps of Muzbees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N. I. (Pioneers), was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Doab Canal.

Myna. Add:

1803. "During the whole of our stay two minahs were talking most incessantly, to the great delight of the old lady, who often laughed at what they said, and praised their talents. Her hookah filled up the interval."—Ld. Valentia, i. 227-8.

1879. ". . . beneath Striped squirrels raced, the mynas perked and picked.

The nine brown sisters* chattered in the thorn. "

E. Arnold, The Light of Asia, Book i.

Nabob. Add under b:

1777. "In such a revolution . . . it was impossible but that a number of individuals should have acquired large property. They did acquire it; and with it they seem to have obtained the detestation of their countrymen, and the appellation of Nabobs as a term of reproach."—Price's Tracts, i. 13.

* Thomas Boileau was an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-Generals John Theophilus and A. H. E. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal).

* See Seven Sisters in GLOSS. Mr. Arnold makes too many!

N.B. The quotation from Leconte de l'Isle should have been under a.

Nalkee, s. H. nālki. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. The former was perhaps a factitious imitation of pālki?

1789. "A naleky is a paleky, either open or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders . . . ."—Note by Tr. of Seir Mutagherin, iii. 269.

Narcondam. Add:

The discrepancy in the position of the island is noticed by D'Anville:

1753. "Je n'oublierai pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce que j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne répond point à la position que nos cartes lui donnent. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Reys indique l'île Narcondão ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des îles Cocos, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman; et le rhumb de vent à l'égard de ce point il le détermine, leste quarta da nordeste, meya quarta mais para les nordestes, c'est à dire à peu-près 17 degrés de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Françaises, Narcondam s'écarte environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman; et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette île baisse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Eclairc., 141-142.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine depuis Suratte jusqu'au Détroit de Malaca, par le Père P. P. Tachard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam, Isle Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

Narrows, The, n. p. A name applied by the Hoogly pilots for at least two centuries to the part of the river immediately below Hoogly Point, now known as 'Hoogly Bight.*

1684. "About 11 o'clock we met with ye Good-hope, at an anchor in ye Narrows, without Hugly River,† and ordered him upon ye first of ye flood to weigh, and make all ye haste he could to Hugly . . ."—Hedges, 64.

* See Mr. Barlow's note on Hedges' Diary, p. 64.
† The "Hugly" River was then considered (in ascending) to begin at Hoogly Point, and the confluence of the Roonnarain R., often called the Gunga (see under Godavery).

1711. "From the lower Point of the Narrows on the Starboard-side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard, until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom . . . From the River of Rogues, the Starboard Shore, with a great Ship, ought to be kept close aboard down to the Channel Trees, for in the Offing lies the Grand middle Ground . . ."—English Pilot, p. 57.

Naund, s. H. nānd. A coarse earthen vessel of large size, resembling in shape an inverted bee-hive, and useful for many economic and domestic purposes. The dictionary definition in Fallon, 'an earthen trough,' conveys an erroneous idea.

Neelam. Add:

1515. "Pero d'Alpoym came full of sorrow to Cochín with all the apparel and servants of Afonso d'Albuquerque, all which Dom Gracia took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the wardrobe, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracia said to D. Aleixo in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old wardrobe of Afonso d'Albuquerque. I can't praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuffs, and that he despised everything but to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 469.

Neelgye. Add:

1773. "Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is called neelgow, and is, I believe, unknown in Europe, which he will deliver to you in my name."—Warren Hastings to Sir G. Colebrooke, in Gleig, i. 288.

Negapatam. Add:

1534. "From this he (Cunhall Marcar, a Mahommedan corsair) went plundering the coast as far as Negapatão, where there were always a number of Portuguese trading, and Moorish merchants. These latter, dreading that this pirate would come to the place and plunder them, to curry favour with him, sent him word that if he came he would make a famous haul, because the Portuguese had there a quantity of goods on the river bank, where he could come up . . ."—Correa, iii. 554.

Negrais. Add:

1763. "It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmahs, who caused our people at Negrais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition."—Fort William Consols, Feb'y. 19th. In Long, 238.

Nelly. Add:

See quotation from Anquetil du Perron in SUPPT. under Jowaur.

Nilgherry. Add:

The following also refers to the Orissa hills:

1752. "Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Mahrattas, who, 600 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the Nelligree Hills."—In Long, p. 42.

Nipa. Add:

1583. "I Portoghesi e noi altri di queste bande di quà non mangiamo nel Regno di Pegù pane di grano . . . ne si beve vino; ma una certa acqua lambiccata da vn albero detto Annipa, ch'è alla bocca assai gustevole; ma al corpo giova e nuoce, secondo le complessioni de gli huomini."—G. Balbi, f. 127.

Nizam, The, n. p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizam,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizām-ul-Mulk, was the title of Asaf Jāh the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzib, who became Sūbādār of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamaluco (q.v.). And the circumstances originating the Hyderabad dynasty were parallel. At the death of Asaf Jāh (in 1748) he was independent sovereign of a large territory in the Deccan, with his residence at Hyderabad, and with dominions in a general way corresponding to those still held by his descendant.

Nizamaluco, n. p. One of the names which constantly occur in the early Portuguese writers on India. It represents Nizām-ul-Mulk. This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bāhmani king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamaluco. Their own title was Nizām Shāh, and this also occurs in the form Nizamoxa.

1521. "Meanwhile (the Governor Diego

Lopes de Sequeira) . . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamaluco, Lord of the lands of Choul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cambaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamaluco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, ii. 623.

c. 1539. "Trelado do Contrato que o Viso Rey Dom Garcia de Noronha fez com hu Niza Muxaa, que d'antes se chamava Hu Niza Maluquo."—Tombo, in Subsídios, 115. See also under Idalcam, quotation from Akbar Nāma.

1553. "This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamaluco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Decan (which we corruptly call Daquem) . . . . The Nizamaluco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally, in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Decan, held his residence in the interior, in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar . . ."—Barros, II. ii. 7.

1563. "... This King of Dely conquered the Decam and the Cuncam; and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Rumis, Coraonis, and Arabs, and he divided his kingdom into captaincies, bestowing upon Adelham (whom we call Idalcam) the coast from Angediva to Cifardam . . . and to Nizamaluco the coast from Cifardam to Negotana . . ."—Garcia, f. 34v.

"R. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamoxa, as you often use that term to me.

"O. At once I tell you he is a king in the Balaghat (Bagalate for Balagate), whose father I have often attended, and sometimes also the son . . ."—Id. f. 33v.

Nokar. Add, before quotations:

According to I. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der Völker Mittel Asiens, p. 96, nükur is in Mongol 'a comrade, dependent, or friend.'

Nol-kole, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as Kol-rabi. It is Brassica oleracea, var. caulo-rapa. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part. I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his Bombay Products spells it Knolkhol. It is apparently Dutch, 'Knollkool,' 'Turnip-cabbage; Choux-rave of the French.

Norimon, s. Japanese word. A sort of portable chair used in Japan.

1618. "As we were going out of the town, the street being full of hackney-men and horses, they would not make me way to passe, but fell a quarrelling with my neremoners, and offred me great abuse . . ."—Cocks, ii. 99.

1768-71. "Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like them, and is called a norimon."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 324.

Nuggurcote. Add:

1809. "At Patancote, where the Padshah (so the Sikhs call Runjeet) is at present engaged in preparations and negotiations for the purpose of obtaining possession of Cote Caungrah (or Nagar Cote), which place is besieged by the Raja of Nepal . . ."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 217.

Numerical Affixes, Coefficients, or Determinatives.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawfurd:

"In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail,' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Alai, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, etc.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Bantak, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading,' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Biji, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks," and so on. Crawfurd names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say, 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 file of soldiers, 100 saül of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; inasmuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!

To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages, including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tête (de bétail), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese piecay. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikaner!'

The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawfurd as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oos, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, divinities, priests, etc.; Yauk, 'a male,' to rational beings not divine; Gauung, 'a brute beast,' to irrational beings; Pya, implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, etc.; Lun, implying rotundity, to eggs, loaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboos, hands, feet, etc.; Tseng and Gyauung, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, etc.

The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numeral-affix * (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the piecey, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numeral-affix ("Two piecey cooly," "three piecey dollar," etc.).

This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Corean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese.

It is found in several languages of Central America, i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahuatl of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the coefficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahuatl or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Tetl (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g., eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, etc., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things; also for walls and furrows:

Tlamantli (from mana, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, etc., also for speeches and sermons:

Olotl (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here.

I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages. In Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Corean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 40; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz., difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern work, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes speedily apparent that he is unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of five dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, so far as number is concerned, with that of five fingers."—(Wilson's Pre-historic Man, 1st ed., ii. 470).

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numeral coefficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of munshis, who delight in what seemed to me, before my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the wilful surplussage (e.g.) of two 'sheets' (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, etc.; three 'persons' (nafar) of bar-kandazes; five 'rope' (rās) of buffaloes; ten 'chains' (zanjir) of elephants;

twenty 'grips' (kabza) of swords, etc. But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the munshi's repertory till I found it displayed in Mr. Carnegie's Kachahri Technicalities, under the head of Muhāwara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find 'adad' ('number') used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; dāna ('grain') with pearls and coral beads; dast ('hand') with falcons, etc., shields, and robes of honour; jild (volume, lit. 'skin') with books; muhār ('nose-bit') with camels; kiṭa ('portion,' piecey) with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; manzil ('a stage on a journey, an alighting-place') with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdas, etc.; sāz ('an instrument') with guitars, etc.; silk ('thread') with necklaces of all sorts; etc.

Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmanli Turkish.*

Pahlavi, Pehlvi. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahlavi was adopted by Europeans from the Parsi use. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflexions agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolution of inflexional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avesta; but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian language during the time of the Arsacidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardashīr-i-Pāpākān (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardashīr Babagān of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet. Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written. The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or logograms, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write malikān malkā, 'King of Kings,' but they would read shāhān shāh. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz.' is a mode of writing 'namely' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them" (E. W. West, Introd. to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii.; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.).†

Extant Pahlavi writings are confined to those of the Parsis, translations from the Avesta, and others almost entirely of a religious character. Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand; a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, paizanti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthva of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name. It is apparently the same word that in the form pahlav and pahlavān, etc., has become the appellation of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armenian, originally derived from the name of that most warlike people the Parthians. Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still unsettled.

* Our symbol (𐬰), now modified into (𐬱), which is in fact Latin et, but is read 'and'.

† "The peculiar mode of writing Pahlavi here alluded to long made the character of the language a standing puzzle for European scholars, and was first satisfactorily explained by Professor Haug, of Munich, in his admirable Essay on the Pahlavi Language, already cited" (West, p. xii.).

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Parsees), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted above, and from Haug's Essays, ed. London, 1878).

Palankeen. Add:

In Gloss, under 1606, I gave a curious quotation from the acts of the Synod of Goa regarding covered palankins. I have since come upon a remonstrance of the City of Goa against the ecclesiastical action in this matter, addressed to the king:

1606. "Last year this City gave your Majesty an account of how the Archbishop Primate proposed the issue of orders that the women should go with their palankins uncovered, or at least half uncovered, and how on this matter were made to him all the needful representations and remonstrances on the part of this whole community, giving the reasons against such a proceeding, which also were sent to Your Majesty. Nevertheless in a Council that was held this last summer, they dealt with this subject, and they agreed to petition Your Majesty to order that the said palankins should travel in such a fashion that it could be seen who was in them.

"The matter is of so odious a nature, and of such a description that Your Majesty should grant their desire in no shape whatever, nor give any order of the kind, seeing this place is a frontier fortress. The reasons for this have been written to Your Majesty; let us beg your Majesty graciously to make no new rule; and this is the petition of the whole community to Your Majesty."—Carta, que a Cidade de Goa escrevea a Sua Magestade, o anno de 1606. In Archivo Port. Or., fascic. 1.<sup>o</sup>, 2.<sup>a</sup> Edição, 2.<sup>a</sup> Parte, 186.

This was quite true up to our own time. In 1840 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 25 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by sixes.

Palempore. Add:

The probability that Palempore is a word originating in a mistaken version of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Bluteau's Dictionary (Suppt., 1727).

"CHAUDUS ou CHAUDEUS são huns panos grandes, que servem para cobrir camas e outras cousas. São pintados de cores muy vistosas, e alguns mais finos, a que chamão palangapuzes. Fabricão-se de algodão em Bengala e Choromandel," i.e. "Chaudus ou Chaudeus" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the same as Choutar among Piece-goods, q.v.) "are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palangposhes," etc.

Pandy. Add:

"In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gunta pandy" (M.-G. Keatinge). Ghunta = a gong or bell.

Papaya. Add, before quotations:

Papaya is applied in the Philippines to Europeans who, by long residence, have fallen into native ways and ideas.

Papua, n. p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word papuwah, or sometimes puwah-puwah, meaning 'frizzle-haired,' and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1528. "And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Magalhães,* where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God's mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papuas, and then the west winds began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered."—Correa, iii. 173–174.

1553. (Referring to the same history.) "Thence he went off to make the islands of a certain people call Papuas, whom many on account of this visit of Don Jorge (de Menezes) call the Islands of Don Jorge, which lie east of the Moluccas some 200 leagues. . . ."—Barros, IV. i. 6.

Parbutty. Add, after quotation from Buchanan:

The word is explained elsewhere by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Hobly in Mysore." A Hobly is a sub-division of a Taluk (i. 270).

Pardao, s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardao runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help on such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying myself regarding the errors alluded to. The subject is in itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and the excessive error in the most important values which they do give, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appends, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Alboquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardao is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. prātāp, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr. D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Prātāpa krishnarāya.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardao was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote,—on the one hand Abdurrazzāk, the Envoy of Shah Rukh, makes the partāb (or pardao) half of the Varāha ('boar,' so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), hūn, or what we call pagoda;—whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardao with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the * "E foy dar no golphum do estreito de Magalhães." I cannot explain the use of this name. It must be applied here to the Sea between Banda and Timor.

"Antonio Nunez, "Comtador da Casa del Rey noso Senhor," who in 1554 compiled the Livro dos Pesos da Índia e asy Medidas e Mohedas, says of Din in particular:

"The moneys here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write any thing certain about them; for every month, every 8 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place" (p. 28).

Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name pardão d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurrazzāk and Varthema respectively are as follows: *

ABDURRAZZAK (A.D. 1443).

3 Jitals (copper)	. = 1 Tar (silver).
6 Tars	. = 1 Fanam (gold).
10 Fanams	. = 1 Partāb.
2 Partābs	. = 1 Varāha.

And the Varāha weighed about 1 Mithkāl, equivalent to 2 dinārs Kopeki.

VARTHEMA (A.D. 1504-5).

16 Cas (see Cash)	. = 1 Tare (silver).
16 Tare	. = 1 Fanam (gold).
20 Fanams	. = 1 Pardao.

And the Pardao was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim of Cairo (gold dinār), but thicker.

The question arises whether the varāha of Abdurrazzāk was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his partāb therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varāha was the pagoda, and his partāb a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varāha, "about one mithkāl," a weight which may be taken at 73 grains, does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) hūn or pagoda, given in Prinsep's Tables, to be 43 grs., the maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varāha and the Italian traveller's pardao contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.†

In further illustration that the pardao was recognised as a half hūn or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note "the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept" in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Dehli, illustrated, &c.‡

* I invert the similar table given by Dr. Badger in his notes to Varthema.

† The issues of fanams, q.v., have been infinite; but they have not varied much in weight, though very greatly in alloy, and therefore in the number reckoned to a pagoda.

‡ "2 gunjās = 1 dugala

2 dugalas = 1 chavula (= the panam or fanam),

2 chavalas = 1 hōpa (= the pratapa, māda, or half pagoda),

2 hōpas = 1 Varāha (the hūn or pagoda)."

"The gunjā or unit (= 2 fanam) is the rati, or Sanskrit raktika, the seed of the abrus."—Op. cit. p. 224, note. See also Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India, now in the press p. 56.

Moreover Dr. D'Acunha states that in the 'New Conquests,' or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, "the accounts were kept until lately in sanvo and nixane pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratāps, . . ." etc. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pardao d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa currency by Albuquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it "was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6½d.* English." Yet he accepts the identity of this pardao d'ouro with the hūn current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanged representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings. And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pardao. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the (imaginary) rei. Seeing that a milrei is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d., we have a single rei = 5d., and 370 reis = 1s. 6½d. It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda, the Venetian sequin, and the dollar.† Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere stares him in the face. Correa tells us that the cruzado which Albuquerque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was indubitably the same as the cruzado of the mother country, and indeed A. Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the cruzado d'ouro de Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin, and for the sultani or Egyptian gold dinār. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambaya, which he calls Madrafaxao (q.v.), was worth from * 360 reis is the equivalent in the authorities, so far as I know.

† Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterling, has come down to one-third of that value; but if the value of silver goes on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!

I have remarked elsewhere:

"Everybody seems to be tickled at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence. Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian Livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!" I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the maravedi entered life as a gold piece, equivalent to the Saracen mithkāl, and ended—?

1260 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and exchange. We have seen that this must have been the gold-mohr of Mudhaffar-Shāh II. of Guzerat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52·27 grs., value 111d. \*) the value of the rei at  $\frac{111d}{240}$  will be . . . . . 264d.

From the Mudhaffar Shāhi mohr (weight 185 grs., value, if pure gold, 392·52d.) value of rei at 1440 . . . . . 0·272d.

Mean value of rei in 1513 . . . . . 0·268d.
i.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us (p. 56), that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst the pagoda was worth 570 to 600 reis (mean 585 reis).

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pagoda, enable us to calculate the value of the rei of about 1600 at . . . . . 0·16d. Values of the milrei given in Milburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Cambist, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the present century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows:

Value of rei in the beginning of the 16th century . . . . . 0·268d.

Value of rei in the beginning of the 17th century . . . . . 0·16d.

Value of rei in the beginning of the 19th century . . . . . 0·06 to 0·066d.

Value of rei at present . . . . . 0·06d.

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.†

* I calculate all gold values in this paper at those of present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portugal rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a reduction of the rei locally below the rei of Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8. I do not know the history or understand the object of such a change, nor do I see that it affects the calculations in this article. In a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Annaes Maritimos of 1844, each coin is valued both in reis of Goa and in reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, Dr. J. N. Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has yet found no document throwing light upon it. It is a matter quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.

† Thus Albuquerque, returning to Europe in 1504, gives a "Moorsish" pilot, who carried him by a new course strait from Cannanore to Mozambique, a buckshish of 50 crúzados; this is explained

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardaos or pagodas. The gold coin of Albuquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a cruzado (or manuel), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de Sá in 1548-9, who issued coins called San Thomé, worth 1000 reis, say about £1 2s. 4d.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1550, and the coins then issued were silver *San Thomé*s, called also patacões. Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardaos, which represented 5 silver tangas, or 300 reis, and these D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in as £5—a mild munificence for such a feat. In truth it was nearly £24, the cruzado being about the same as the sequin (see i. p. 17).

The Mint at Goa was farmed out by the same great man, after the conquest, for 600,000 reis, amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £670 (iii. 41).

Albuquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat "10,000 xerafins of gold." And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £625. The coin in question is the ashraf, or gold dirhām, as much as, or more than the sequin in value, and the sum more than £5000 (i. p. 82).

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the cruzado is "a silver coin (formerly gold), now equivalent to 480 reis, or about 2s. English money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Dalboquerque." "Much more relatively" means of course that the 2s. had much more purchasing power.

This is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The change in purchasing power in India generally till the beginning of this century was probably not very great. There is a curious note by Gen. Briggs in his translation of Firishta, comparing the amount stated by Firishta to have been paid by the Bāhmanī King, about A.D. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of irregular horse of the same strength in Briggs's own time (see about 1815). The Bāhmanī charge was 350,000 Rs.; the British charge 219,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 287,300 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1850.

The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1550, was 8000 cruzados, or nearly £4000 a year; and the salaries of the commanders of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Dio, and of Bassain, 600,000 reis, or about £670.

The salary of Ibn Batuta, when Judge of Delhi, about 1340, was 1000 silver tankas or dirhāms as he calls them (practically 1000 rupees) a month, which was in addition to an assignment of villages bringing in 5000 tankas a year. And yet he got into debt in a very few years to the tune of 55,000 tankas—say £5,500!

account so many tangas of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Balbi (1580), Barrett (1584),* and Linschoten (1583-1589), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called xerafin and pardao-xerafin, which was worth 5 tangas, each of 60 reis. (So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the reis, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account.) The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or xerafin at this time as worth 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge; we then find the tanga gone down to 6d. and the pardao or xerafin to 2s. 6d. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to  $1\frac{1}{2}$  perdo. Calculating the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depreciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the denomination of pardao. And the half-rupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valuation of the Goa Rupee than that in Prinsep's Tables (Thomas's edition, p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company's Rupee at 2s., would make it 21d. The Pardao therefore would represent a value of  $10\frac{1}{2}$ d., and there we leave it.

1444. "In this country (Vijayanagar) they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloys: one called varahah weighs about one mithkal, equivalent to two dinars kopeki; the second, which is called pertab, is the half of the first; the third, called fanom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last-mentioned coin. Of these different coins the fanom is the most

c. 1504-5; pubd. 1510. "I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island, which . . . is called Goga (Goa) and which pays annually to the King of Decan 19,000 golden ducats, called by them pardai. These pardai are smaller than the seraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped upon one side, and certain letters on the other."—Varthema, pp. 115-116.

" . . . His money consists of a pardao, as I have said. He also coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom . . ."—Id., p. 130.

1510. "Meanwhile the Governor (Albuquerque) talked with certain of our people who were goldsmiths, and understood the alligation of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country pardaos of gold, worth in gold 360 reis, and also a money of good silver which they called barganym (see bargani in SUPPL.) of the value of 2 vintems, and a money of copper which they called bazarucos (see Budgerock), of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assayed. And he caused to be made cruzados of their proper weight of 420 reis, on which he figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel; and he ordered that this cruzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reis, to prevent their being exported. . . and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargany; on this money he caused to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espera; it was worth 2 vintems; also there were half esperas worth one vintem; and he made bazarucos of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaruco he divided into 4 coins which they called cepayguas (see Sapèque), and he gave the bazarucos the name of leaes. And in changing the cruzado into these smaller coins it was reckoned at 480 reis."—Correa, ii. 76-77.

1516. "There are current here (in Baticala, see Batcul) the pardaos, which are a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reis, and there is another coin, of silver, called dama, which is worth 20 reis. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., p. 293.

"There is used in this city (Bisnagar) and throughout the rest of the Kingdom much pepper, which is carried hither from Malabar on oxen and asses; and it is all bought and sold for pardaos, which are made in some places of this Kingdom, and especially in a city called Hora (?), whence they are called hordos."—Id., 297.

Parell. Add: It seems probable that in the following passage, Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published till 1774, this is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parell was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

"Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau couvent auprès du Village de Parell au milieu de l'Isle, mais il y a déjà plusieurs années, qu'elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l'Eglise est actuellement une magnifique salle à manger et de danse, qu'on n'en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes."—Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 12.

Patcharee. Add:

Mr. Whitworth, s.v. Patcherry, says that "in some native regiments the term denotes the married sepoy's quarters, possibly because Pariah sepoys had their families with them, while the higher castes left them at home." He does not say whether Bombay or Madras sepoys are in question. But in any case what he states confirms the origin ascribed to the Bengal Presidency term Patcharée.

1747. "Patcherree Point, mending Platforms and Gunports. . . (Pgs.) 4: 21: 48."—Accounts from Fort St. David, under Feb. 21. MS. Records, in India Office.

Pattamar. Add, to note at p. 520, col. b:

Mr. J. M. Campbell, who is very accurate, in the Bo. Gazetteer writes the vessel as pātimār, though identifying, as we have done, both uses with pātimār, 'courier.' The Moslem, he says, write phatēmārī, quasi fath-mār, 'snake of victory' (?).

According to a note in Notes and Extracts, No. I. (Madras, 1871), p. 27, under a Fort St. Geo. Consultation of July 4th, 1673, Pattamar is therein used "for a native vessel on the Coromandel Coast, though now confined to the Western Coast." We suspect a misapprehension. For in the following entry we have no doubt that the parenthetical gloss is wrong, and that couriers are meant:

"A letter sent to the President and Council at Surraat by a Pair of Pattamars" (native craft) express . . .—Op. cit. No. II. p. 8.

Pawl. I believe the statement in GLOSS, 'no ridge-pole,' is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pāl and chholdārī (see Shooldarry). A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pāl, but is trimmer, tauter, better closed, and sometimes has two flies.

1793. "There were not, I believe, more than two small Pauls, or tents, among the whole of the deputation that escorted us from Patna."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul, p. 118.

1827. "It would perhaps be worth while to record . . . the matériel and personnel of my camp equipment; an humble captain and single man travelling on the most economical principles. One double-poled tent, one routee, or small tent, a pāl or servants' tent, 2 elephants, 6 camels, 4 horses, a pony, a buggy, and 24 servants, besides mahouts, serwans or camel-drivers, and tent pitchers."—Mundy, Journal of a Tour in India.

We may note that this is an absurd exaggeration of any equipment that, even sixty years since, would have characterised the march of a "humble captain travelling on economical principles," or any one under the position of a highly-placed civilian. Captain Mundy must have been enormously extravagant.

Pawnee, Kalla. Add, before quotations:

'Hindu servants and sepoys used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kālā pānī. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the Ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of the Arya varṭta' (Note by Lt.-Col. J. M. Trotter).

reference to certain measures of Mr. Huskisson's. The passage ends thus: "India is the country that has been worst used in the new arrangements. All her products ought undoubtedly to be imported freely into England, upon paying the same duties, and no more, which English duties pay in India. When I see what is done in Parliament against India, I think that I am reading about Edward III. and the Flemings."

Sir A. Arbuthnot adds very appropriately a passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James Mill's History of India, (1845, vol. I. pp. 538-539), a passage which we gladly also insert here:

"It was stated in evidence (in 1813) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for a profit in the British market at a price from 50 to 60 per cent. lower than those fabricated in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 70 or 80 per cent. on their value, or by positive prohibition. Had this not been the case, had not such prohibitory duties and decrees existed, the mills of Paisley and of Manchester would have been stopped in their outset, and could scarcely have been again set in motion, even by the powers of steam. They were created by the sacrifice of the Indian manufactures. Had India been independent, she would have retaliated; would have imposed preventive duties upon British goods, and would thus have preserved her own productive industry from annihilation. This act of self-defence was not permitted her; she was at the mercy of the stranger. British goods were forced upon her without paying any duty; and the foreign manufacturer employed the arm of political injustice to keep down and ultimately strangle a competitor with whom he could not contend on equal terms."

Pig-sticking.

1679. "In the morning we went a hunting of wild Hogs with Kisna Reddy, the chief man of the Islands" (at mouth of the Kistna) "and about 100 other men of the island (Dio) with lances and Three score dogs, with whom we killed eight Hogs great and small, one being a Bore very large and fatt, of greates weight."—Consn. of Agent and Council of Port St. Geo. on Tour. In Notes and Extracts, No. II.

The party consisted of Streynsham Master "Agent of the Coast and Bay," with "Mr. Timothy Willes and Mr. Richard Mohun of the Council, the Minister, the Chyrurgeon, the Schoolmaster, the Secretary, and two Writers, an Ensign, 6 mounted soldiers and a Trumpeter," in all 17 Persons in the Company's service, and "Four Freeman, who went with the Agent's Company for their own pleasure, and at their own charges." It was a Tour of Visitation of the Factories.

Pishashee. Add:

1816. "Whirlwinds . . . at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives peshashes or devils."—Asiatic Journal, ii. 367.

Plantain. Add, at foot of p. 541, col. a:

Platano and plantano are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

1664.

"Wake, Wake, Quevera! Our soft rest must cease,
And fly together with our country's peace!
No more must we sleep under plantain shade,
Which neither heat could pierce nor cold invade;
Where bounteous Nature never feels decay,
And opening buds drive falling fruits away."
Dryden, Prologue to the Indian Queen.

Plassey. n.p. The village Palāsī, which gives its name to Lord Olive's famous battle (23d June, 1757). It is said to take its name from the palās (or dhaw) tree.

1748. "... That they have great reason to complain of Ensign English's conduct for not waiting at Placy . . . and that if he had staid another day at Placy, as Tullerooy Caun was marching with a large force towards Cutway, they presume the Mahrattas would have retreated inland on their approach and left him an open passage. . . ."—Letter from Council at Cossimbazar, in Long, p. 2.

1768-71. "General CLIVE, who should have been the leader of the English troops in this battle (Plassy), left the command to Colonel COORE, and remained hid in his palankeen during the combat, out of the reach of the shot, and did not make his appearance before the enemy were put to flight."—Stavorinus, E.T., i. 486.

This stupid and inaccurate writer says that several English officers who were present at the battle related this "anecdote" to him. This, it is to be hoped, is as untrue as the rest of the story. Even to such a writer one would have supposed that Clive's mettle would be familiar.

· Podār, s. H. poddār, corn. of Pers. fojadār, from foṭa, a bag of money. A cash-keeper, or especially an officer attached to a treasury, whose business it is to weigh money and bullion and appraise the value of coins.

1680. See quotation under Dustoor in SUPP.

1683. "The like losses in proportion were preferred to be proved by Ramchurne Podar, Bendura bun Podar, and Mamobishwas, who produced their several books for evidence."—Hedges, p. 84.

Poligar. Add:

1800. "I think Pournaya's mode of dealing with these rajahs . . . is excellent. He sets them up in palankins, elephants, &c., and a great sowarry, and makes them attend to his person. They are treated with great respect, which they like, but can do no mischief in the country. Old Hyder adopted this plan, and his operations were seldom impeded by polygar wars."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro; in Arbuthnot's Mem., xcii.

Pommelo. Add:

1661. "The fruit called by the Netherlanders Pumpelmoos, by the Portuguese Jamboá, grows in superfluity outside the city of Batavia . . . This fruit is larger than any of the lemon-kind, for it grows as large as the head of a child of 10 years old. The core or inside is for the most part reddish, and has a kind of sourish sweetness, tasting like unripe grapes."—Walter Schulzen, 236.

Pondicherry. Add:

1680. "Mr. Edward Brogden, arrived from Porto Novo, reports arrival at Puddicherry of two French ships from Surat, and the receipt of advice of the death of Sevajie."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., May 23rd. In Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 20.

1753. "L'établissement des Français à Pondicheri remonte jusqu'en l'année 1674; mais par de si foibles commencemens, qu'on n'aurait eu de la peine à imaginer, que les suites en fussent aussi considerables."—D'Anville, p. 121.

Porcelain. Add:

1461. "Porcellane pezzi 20, cioè 7 piattine, 5 scodelle, 4 grandi e una picciola, piattine 5 grandi, 3 scodelle, una biava, e due bianche."—List of presents sent by the Soldan of Egypt to the Doge Pasquale Malepiero. In Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, xxi. col. 1170.

Porgo, s. We know this word only from its occurrence in the passage quoted; and most probably the explanation suggested by the editor of the Notes is correct, viz., that it represents Port. peragua. This word is perhaps the same as piroque, used by the French for a canoe or 'dug-out'; a term said by Littré to be (piroga) Carib.

1680. Fort St. Geo. Consn., Jany. 30th, "records arrival from the Bay of the 'Success,' the Captain of which reports that a Porgo [Peragua?, a fast-sailing vessel, Clipper] drove ashore in the Bay about Pepley . . ."—Notes and Extracts, No. III., p. 2.

Pra, Phra. Add:

In a short paper in the Bijdragen of the Royal Institute of the Hague, Dl. X. 4de Stuk, 1885, Professor Kern indicates that this term was also in use in Java, with certain derivatives, in the forms Bra and pra, with the sense of 'splendid' and the like; and he cites as an example Bra-Wijaya (the style of several of the medieval kings of Java), where Bra is exactly the representative of Skt. Śrī.

Praag, sometimes Piagg, n. p. Properly Prayāga, 'the place of sacrifice,' the old Hindu name of Allahabad, and especially of the river confluence there, since remote ages a place of pilgrimage.

c. A.D. 638. "Le royaume de Polo-ye-kia (Prayāga) a environ 5000 li de tour. La capitale, qui est située au confluent de deux fleuves, a environ 20 li de tour . . . Dans la ville, il y a un temple des dieux qui est d'une richesse éblouissante, et où éclatent une multitude de miracles . . . Si quelqu'un est capable de pousser le mépris de la vie jusqu'à se donner la mort dans ce temple, il obtient le bonheur éternel et les joies infinies des dieux . . . Depuis l'antiquité jusqu'à nos jours, cette coutume insensée n'a pas cessé un instant."—Hsiouen-Thsang, in Pél. Boudd., ii. 276-279.

c. 1020. ". . . thence to the tree of Barāgi, 12 (parasangs). This is at the confluence of the Jumna and Ganges."—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 55.

1529. "The same day I swam across the river Ganges for my amusement. I counted my strokes, and found that I crossed over at 33 strokes. I then took breath and swam back to the other side. I had crossed by swimming every river that I had met with, the river Ganges alone excepted. On reaching the place where the Ganges and Jumna unite, I rowed over in the boat to the Piāg side . . ."—Baber, 406.

1585. ". . . Frō Agra I came to Prage, where the river Jemena entrench into the mightie river Ganges, and Jemena looseth his name."—R. Fitch, in Hakluyt, ii. 386.

Praya, s. This is in Hongkong the name given to what in most of the foreign settlements in China is called the Bund; i.e. the promenade or drive along the sea. It is Port. praia, 'the shore.'

President. Add:

1670. The Court, in a letter to Fort St. George, fix the amount of tonnage to be allowed to their officers (for their private investments) on their return to Europe: "Presidents and Agents, at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . . . 5 tonns. Chiefes, at Persia, the Bay (q.v.), Mesulapatam, and Macassar: Deputy at Bombay, and Seconds at Surat, Fort St. George, and Bantam . . . 3 tonns." In Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 3.

Prow. Add:

1586. "The fifth and last festival, which is called Sapan Donon, is one in which the King (of Pegu) is embarked in the most beautiful parò, or boat, . . .”—G. Balbi, f. 122.

Puckauly. Add:

1803. “It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leathern bags, called here puckauly bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckauly-boys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans.”—Percival’s Ceylon, p. 102.

Pultun, s. A H. corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of platoon or péloton. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800. “All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy some camposos and pultons which have been indiscreetly pushed across the Kistna.”—A. Wellesley to T. Munro. In Memo. of Munro, by Arbuthnot, lxxix.

Pulwáh. Add:

1782. “To be sold, Three New Dacca Pulwars, 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each.”—India Gazette, Aug. 31st.

Pun. Add:

1760. “We now take into consideration the relief of the menial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appear in near a quadruple (proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

“No tailor to demand for making:

1 Jamma more than 3 annas.

* * *

1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.
No washerman:

1 corge of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.

No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas” (see under Cowry).

Fort William Consns., March 27th.
In Long, 209.

Punch. Add:

1683. “Bolleponge est vn mot Anglois, qui signifie vne boisson dont les Anglois vsent aux Indes faite de sucre, suc de limon, eau de vie, fleur de muscade, et biscuit rotý.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1637, p. 534.

1682. “Some (of the Chinese in Batavia) also sell Sugar-beer, as well as cooked dishes and Sury, arak or Indian brandy; wherefrom they make Mussak and Follepos, as the Englishmen call it.”—Nieuhoff, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 217.

Punchayet. Add:

1778. “The Honourable WILLIAM HORNBY,

Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty’s Castle and Island of Bombay, &c.

“The humble Petition of the Managers of the Panchayet of Parsis at Bombay . . .”
—Dosambhai Framji, H. of the Parsis, 1884, ii. 219.

1832. Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a punchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the fatwa. See under Law Officer in SUPPT.

1853. “From the death of Runjeet Singh to the battle of Sobraon, the Sikh Army was governed by ‘Punchayets’ or ‘Punches’—committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by some one who paid higher.”—Sir C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

Punch-house. Add:

1676. Major Puckle’s “Proposals to the Agent about the young men at Metchlepatam.

“That some pecuniary mulct or fine be imposed . . . for misdemeanours.”

* * *
“6. Going to Punch or Back-houses without leave or warrantable occasion.

“Drubbing any of the Company’s Peons or servants.”

* * *
—In Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 40.

Punkah. Add:

Mr. Busteed observes:

“It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through old records in the last century, is there any mention of the punka, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use . . . The swinging punka, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period . . . This dates from an early year in the present century.” (Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115.) He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction.

Purdese, s. H. paradesi, usually contr. purdesi, ‘one from a foreign country.’ In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepoy from Northern India.

Putnee, Putney, s. a. H. and Beng. paṭṭanī, or paṇī, from v. paṭ-nā, to be agreed or closed (i.e. a bargain). Goods commissioned or manufactured to order.

1755. “A letter from Cossimbazar mentions they had directed Mr. Warren Hastings to proceed to the Putney Aurung (q.v.) in order to purchase putney on our Honble. Masters' account, and to make all necessary enquiries."—Fort William Consns., Nov. 10th. In Long, 61.

b. A kind of sub-tenure existing in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the patni-dār, or occupant of which "holds of a Zemindar a portion of the Zemindari in perpetuity, with the right of hereditary succession, and of letting or selling the whole or part, so long as a stipulated amount of rent is paid to the Zemindar, who retains the power of sale for arrears, and is entitled to a regulated fee or fine upon transfer" (Wilson, q.v.).

Probably both a and b are etymologically the same, and connected with paṭṭā (see Pottah).

Pyjamma. Add:

1881. "The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pajama suit" (?).—Haeckel, Ceylon, 329.

Pyke, b. Add:

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of Lord Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792. "All Pykes, Chokeydars, Pasbans, Dusads, Nigabans, Harees, and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah . . ."—Regns. for the Police . . ., passed by the G.-G. in C., Decr. 7th, 1792.

Pyke and Chokidar are in GLOSS. For Hārī in this use, see Harry in SUPPT. They and the Dosāds, another low-caste, were in various parts employed as village watchmen. Pāsbān and Nigabān are Persian, both meaning literally 'watch-keeper,' the one from pās, 'a watch,' in the sense of a division of the day, the other from nigah, 'watch,' in the sense of 'heed' or 'observation.'

1792. "The army of Assam was a militia organised as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called gotes, the individuals comprising the gotes being termed pykes."—Johnstone's Acct. of Welsh's Expedition to Assam, 1792-93-94 (commd. by Gen. Keatinge).

Pyse interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotation. Notwithstanding the writer's remark, it is really Hindustani, viz. pyesh!

'look out!' or 'make way!' apparently from Skt. paśyu! 'look! see!' (see Molesworth's Marh. Dict., p. 529, col. c; and Fallon's Hind. Dict., p. 376, col. a).

1883. "Does your correspondent Col. Prideaux know the origin of the warning called out by buggy drivers to pedestrians in Bombay, 'Pyse?' It is not Hindustani."—Letter in N. and Q., Ser. VI. viii. p. 388.

Q.

Quemoy, n.p. An island at the eastern opening to the Harbour of Amoy (q.v.). It is a corruption of Kin-mān, in Chang-chau dialect Kin-mui, meaning 'Golden-door.'

R.

Radaree. Add:

1622. "At the garden Pelengon we found a rahdar or guardian of the road, who was also the chief over certain other rahdari, who are usually posted in another place 2 leagues further on."—P. della Valle, ii. 285.

Regulation. Add:

1868. "The new Commissioner . . . could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations! How was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with?"—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, p. 376.

Reshire, n.p. Rishihir. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century.

I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Reyael in the quotation from A. Nunes under Dubber in GLOSS, and that the explanation which I have given in the note there is erroneous.

The spelling Raxet in Barros below, is no doubt a clerical error for Razel.

c. 1340. "Rishihir. . . This city built by Lohrasp, was rebuilt by Shapūr son of Ardeshir Babegān; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy . . . . The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependence on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloths called Rischihri are the chief productions."—Hamdalla Mastāfi, quoted in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse.

1514. "And thereupon Pero Dalboquerque sailed away . . . and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it . . . and when he was as far advanced as Bārem, the winds being now westerly—he tacked about, and stood along in the tack for a two days voyage, and reached Raxel, where he found Mirbuzaca, Captain of the Xeque Isnail,* who had captured 20 terradas from a Captain of the King of Ormuz."—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

"On the Persian side (of the Gulf) is the Province of Raxel, which contains many villages and fortresses along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Id. 186-7.

1534. "And at this time insurrection was made by the King of Raxel, (which is a city on the coast of Persia); who was a vassal of the King of Ormuz, so the latter King sought help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silveira. And he sent down Jorge de Crasto with a galliot and two foists and 100 men, all well equipt, and good musketeers; and bade him tell the King of Raxel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 557.

1553. ". . . And Francisco de Gouvea arrived at the port of the city of Raxet, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that . . . he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormuz."—Barros, IV., iv. 26.

1554. Reyxel, see under Dubber, as above.

1600. "Reformados y proueydos en Harmuz de lo necessario, nos tornamos a partir . . . fuyamos esta vez por fuera de la isla Queixiome (see Kishm) corriendo la misma costa, como de la primera, passamos . . . mas adelante la fortaleza de Raxel, celebre por el mucho y perfetio pan y frutos, que su territorio produce."—Teixeira, Viage, 70.

1856. "48 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ships of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidable position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshire) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Despatch in Lowe's H. of the Indian Navy, ii. 346.

Resident. Add:

a.

1748. "We received a letter from Mr. Henry Kelsall, Resident at Ballasore."—Fort William Consn., in Long, 3.

1760. "Agreed, Mr. Howitt the present Resident in Rajah Tillack Chund's country (i.e. Burdwan) for the collection of the tuncabs, he wrote to . . ."—Do., March 29th, in Do., 244.

RESSALDAR. Add:

This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables (see Panjab Notes and Queries, ii. 84).

Rhinoceros. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 16th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himālaya, but in the forests near Peshāwar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshāwar.

See also Ganda, in Gloss. and SUPPT.

c. 1387. "In the month of Zi-l Ka'da of the same year he (Prince Muhammed Khan) went to the mountains of Sirmor (W. of the Jumna) and spent two months in hunting the rhinoceros and the elk."—Tārīkh-i-Mubarak-Shāhi, in Elliot, i. 16.

1398. (On the frontier of Kashmir). "Comme il y avoit dans ces Pays un lieu qui par sa vaste étendue, et la grande quantité de gibiers, sembloit inviter les passans à chasser . . . Timur s'en donna le divertissement . . . ils präsent une infinité de gibiers, et l'on tua plusieurs rhinoceros à coups de sabre et de lances, quoique cet animal . . . a la peau si ferme, qu'on ne peut la percer que par des efforts extraordinaires."—Petis de la Croix, H. de Timur-Bec, iii. 159.

1519. "After sending on the army towards the river (Indus), I myself set off for Sawāti, which they likewise call Karak-Khaneh,* to hunt the rhinoceros. We started many rhinoceroses, but as the country abounds in brushwood, we could not get at them. A she rhinoceros, that had whelps, came out, and fled along the plain; many arrows were shot at her, but . . . she gained cover. We set fire to the brushwood, but the rhinoceros was not to be found. We got sight of another, that, having been scorched in the fire, was lamed and unable to run. We killed it, and every one cut off a bit of it as a trophy of the chase."—Baber, 253.

* i.e. Shāh Ismail Sufi, of Persia.

* The term Kark-khāna means the 'rhinoceros-haunt.'

1554. "Nous vinmes à la ville de Pour-scheuer (Peshawar), et ayant heureusement passé le Koutel (see Kotal), nous gagnâmes la ville de Djouschayeh. Sur le Koutel nous aperçûmes des rhinocéros, dont la grosseur approchait celle d'un elephant . . ."—Sidi 'Ali, in J. As., 1 ser., tom. ix., 201-202.

Rhotass, n. p. This (Rohtās) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Shāhābād district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Sōn river to a height of 1490 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shāh, the successful rival of the Mogul Humāyūn:

b. A fort at the north end of the Salt-range in the Jhelum District, Punjab, which was built by the same king, named by him after the ancient Rohtās. The ruins are very picturesque.

c. 1560. "Sher Shāh was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle . . . He kept money (khazāna) and revenue (kharrāj) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessity required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasury was in Rohtās under the charge of Ikhtiyār Khān."—Wakī'at-i Mushtakī, in Elliot, iv. 551.

1665. ". . . You must leave the great Road to Patna, and bend to the South through Exberbourgh (?) and the famous Fortress of Rhodes."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 53.

c. 1540. "Sher Shāh . . . . . marched with all his forces and retinue through all the hills of Padmān and Garjhāk, in order that he might choose a fitting site, and build a fort there to keep down the Ghakkars . . . Having selected Rohtās, he built there the fort which now exists."—Tarīkh-i-Sher Shāhi, in Elliot, iv. 390.

1809. "Before we reached the Hydraspes we had a view of the famous fortress of Rotas; but it was at a great distance. . . . Rotas we understood to be an extensive but strong fort on a low hill."—Elphinstone, Cambul, ed. 1839, i. 108.

Rogue's River, n. p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunderbund channels joining the lower Hoogly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakan Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hoogly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedges' Diary for the Hakluyt Society, identifies Rogue's River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Saugor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just opposite Buffalo Point, "R. Theeves," then, as we descend, the R. Rangafula, and, close below that, "Rogues" (without the word River), and still further below, Chanell Creek or R. Jessore. Rangafula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.

After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chingri Khāl, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kalpī Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chingri Khāl. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Theeves of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Saugor\* with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the "first safe anchoring Place in the River," viz., Diamond Harbour. The Rogue's River was apparently a little 'above the head of the Grand Middle Ground' or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some  $7\frac{1}{2}$  m. below Buffalo Point, and 6 m. below Chingri Khāl. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the "R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People Adegom." Now there is a town on the Chingri Khāl, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell's map Ottogunge, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttoogum. Further, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India 1683. "And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by y<sup>e</sup> Council that if I should not prevail to go this way to Decca, I should attempt to do it with y<sup>e</sup> Sloopes by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Decca."—*Hedges, Hak. 1711. "Directions to go up along the Western Shore . . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers.\* You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Buffalo Point bears from you  $\frac{1}{2}$  N.  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E."—The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 54.

"Mr. Herring, the Pilot's Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hughley . . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard, until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegom . . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard?) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard all along down to Channel Trees, for in the offing lies the Grand Middle Ground."—Ibid. p. 57.

1727. "The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Sagor,† commonly known by the Name of Rogues River, which had that Appellation from some Banditti Portuguese, who were followers of Shah Sujah . . . for those Portuguese . . . after their Master's Flight to the Kingdom of Arakan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with all the Channels from Xatigam to the Westward, from this River they used to sally out."—A. Hamilton, ii. 3.

1752. " . . . On the receipt of your Honors' orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master Attendant, and directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honors' Ships higher than Rogues River."—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 32.

Roomes. Add:

1781. "These Espanyols are a very western nation, always at war with the Roman Emperors; * since the latter took from them the city of Ashtenbol (Istambul), about 500 years ago, in which time they have not ceased to wage war with the Roomees."—Seir Mutagherin, iii. 336.

Roselle, s. The Indian Hibiscus or Hib. sabdariffa, L. The fleshy calyx makes an excellent sub-acid jelly, and is used likewise for tarts; also called 'Red Sorrel.' The French call it ('Guinea Sorrel,') Oseille de Guinée, and Roselle is probably a corruption of Oseille.

Rowce. Add:

1838. "We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the brawling mountain stream, aided by my long pahārī pole of rous wood."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 241.

Rubbee, s. Ar. rabī 'the Spring.' In India applied to the crops, or harvest of the crops, which are sown after the rains and reaped in the following spring or early summer. Such crops are wheat, barley, gram, linseed, tobacco, onions, carrots and turnips, etc. See Khurreef.

Ruble, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 1½d. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1559. "Vix centum annos vtuntur moneta argentea, praesertim apud illos cussa. Initio cum argentum in provinciam inferebatur, fundebantur portunculæ oblongæ argenteæ, sine imagine et scriptura, aestimatione vnus rubli, quarum nulla nunc apparet."*—Herbststein, in Reyem Moscovit. Auctores, Francof., 1600, p. 42.

1591. "This penaltie or mulct is 20 dingoes (see Tanga) or pence upon every rubble or mark, and so ten in the hundred. . . . Ibn Battuta says: "At one day's journey from Ukak are the hills of the Rûs, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mines, and they bring from their country saum, i.e. ingots of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each ingot is five ounces."—i. 414. Pegolotti (c. 1340), speaking of the land-route to Cathay, says that on arriving at Cassai (i.e. Kinsay of Marco Polo or Hang-chau-fu) "you can dispose of the sonmai of silver that you have with you. . . and you may reckon the sonmai to be worth 5 golden forus" (see in Cathay, &c., ii. 288-9, 293). It would appear from Waksch's quotation by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, 224) that gold ingots also were called saum or saum. The ruble is still called sam in Turkestan.

they call Roubles. . . ."—Macarins, E. T., by Balfour, i. 280.

Rum. Add:

"Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1645. A MS. 'Description of Barbados,' in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1651, says: "The chief fudding they make in the Island is Rumbullion, alias Kill-Devil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor." G. Warren's Description of Surinam, 1661, shows the word in its present short form: 'Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes, . . . called Kill-Devil in New-England.' 'Rumbullion' is a Devonshire word, meaning 'a great tumult,' and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumbowling, which sailors give to their grog."—Academy, Sept. 5, 1885.

Ruttee. Add:

Further notices of the rati used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India, now in the press (p. 49). Sir Walter's experience is that the rati of the gem-dealers is a double rati, and an approximation to the manjâdi (see Mangelin in GLOSS. and SUPPL.). This accounts for Tavernier's valuation at 3½ grs.

S.

Sabaio or Çabaio, etc., n. p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahomedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bihmanî kingdom of the Deccan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 15th century, became the founder of the 'Adil Shâhî family which reigned at Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see Idalcân).

His real name was Abdul Muzaffar

Yūsuf, with the surname Sabāz or Savāz. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2), that he had this name from being a native of Sāvā in Persia. Garcia De Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sāhib (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Albuquerque, ii. 52), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that "the word may possibly be connected with sipahi, Arabic, a soldier," is quite inadmissible (nor is sipāhī Arabic).

There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishta, that the Sabaio was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Agā Murād (or 'Amurath') II., who was saved from murder at his father's death, and placed in the hands of 'Imād ud-dīn, a Persian merchant of Sāvā, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and, being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Deccan (Briggs's Firishta, iii. 7-8).

1510. "But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Qabāio had taken it from the Hindoos."—Dalboquerque, ii. 96.

"In this island (Goa, called Goga) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Savain, who has 400 Mamelukes, he himself being also a Mameluke. . . ."—Varthema, 116.

1516. "Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Daquem (Deccan), and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining to the interior; and in it there was a great Lord, a vassal of the said King (of Deccan) called Sabayo, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Qabaym Hydalcān. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 287.

1503. "O. . . And returning to our subject, as Adel in Persian means 'justice,' they called the prince of these territories Adelham, as it were 'Lord of Justice.'

"R. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabaio?

"O. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name; but I afterwards came to know that in fact saibo in Arabic means 'lord.' . . ."—Garcia, f. 36.

Sagar-pesha, s. Camp-followers, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hindustani as written above, is Pers. shāgird-peshā (lit. shāgird, a disciple, a servant, and peshā 'business').

b. St. John's Island. Note :

More correctly this is called Shang-chuang; it is about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River.

1552. "Inde nos ad Sancianum, Sinarum insulam a Cantone millia pas. circiter cxx Deus perduxit incolumes."—Scti. Franc. Xaverii Epistt. Pragae 1667, IV. xiv.

Salabad. See under Roocka in SUPPT.

Salak, s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation. It is the fruit of a species of rutan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotan-salak.

1768-71. "The salac (Calamus rotang zalacca) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 241.

Salempoory. Add :

1680. "Certain goods for Bantam priced as follows :—

"Salampores, Blew, at 14 Pagodas per corge. . . ."—Fort St. George Consn. April 22nd, in Notes and Extracts, iii. p. 16; also ibid. p. 24.

1747. "The Warehousekeeper reported that on the 1st inst. when the French entered our Bounds and attacked us . . . it appeared that 5 Pieces of Long Cloth and 10 Pieces of Salampores were stolen, That Two Pieces of Salampores were found upon a Peon . . . and the Person detected is ordered to be severely whipped in the Face of the Publick. . . ."—Fort St. David Consn., March 30th (MS. Records in India Office).

Saligram. Add :

1824. "The shalgramū is black, hollow, and nearly round; it is found in the Gunduk River, and is considered a representation of Vishnoo. . . . The Shalgramū is the only stone that is naturally divine; all the other stones are rendered sacred by incantations."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 43.

1855. "My father had one (a Salagram). It was a round, rather flat, jet black, small, shining stone. He paid it the greatest reverence possible, and allowed no one to touch it, but worshipped it with his own hands. When he became ill, and as he would not allow a woman to touch it, he made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present."—Sundarābdi, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 109.

The sālagrāma is in fact a Hindu fetich.

Salsette. Add at the end of a, p. 594:

This name occurs in the form shat-sashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Bo. J. R. As. Soc., xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Naura, "one of the 66 of Sri Sthānaka (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J. R. As. Soc., ii. 383). I have to thank Mr. J. M. Campbell, C.S.I., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

1777. "The acquisition of the Island of Salset, which in a manner surrounds the Island of Bombay, is sufficient to secure the latter from the danger of a famine."—Price's Tracts, i. 101.

Samshoo. Add:

1684. "... Sampsoe, or Chinese Beer."—Valentijn, iv. (China) 129.

Sanguicel, s. This is a term (pl. sanguiceis) often used by the Portuguese writers on India for a kind of boat, or small vessel, used in war. We are not able to trace any origin in a vernacular word. It is perhaps taken from the similar proper name which is the subject of the next article. Bluteau gives: "Sanguicel; termo da India. He hum genero de embarcação pequena q serve na costa da India para dar alcance aos paròs dos Mouros," i. e. to give chase to the prows of the Moors."

1598. "The Conde (Francisco da Gama) was occupied all the winter (q.v.) in reforming the fleets . . . and as the time came on he nominated his brother D. Luiz da Gama to be Captain-Major of the Indian Seas for the expedition to Malabar, and he wrote to Baçaim to equip six very light Sanguiceis according to instructions which should be given by Sebastian Botelho, a man of great experience in that craft. . . . These orders were given by the Count Admiral because he perceived that big fleets were not of use to guard convoys, and that it was light vessels like these alone which could catch the paraos and vessels of the pirates . . . for these escaped our fleets, and got hold of the merchant vessels at their pleasure, darting in and out, like light horse, where they would. . . ."—Couto, Dec. XII., Liv. I., cap. 18.

1605. "And seeing that I am informed that . . . the incursions of certain pirates who still infest that coast might be prevented with less apparatus and expense, if we had light vessels which would be more effective than the foists and galleys of which the fleets have hitherto been composed, seeing how the enemy use their sanguiceis, which our ships and galleys cannot overtake, I enjoin and order you to build a quantity of light vessels to be employed in guarding the coast in place of the fleet of galleys and foists. . . ."—King's Letter to Dom Afonso de Castro, in Livros das Monções, i. 26.

1614. "The eight Malabaresque Sanguiceis that Francis de Miranda despatched to the north from the bar of Goa went with three chief captains, each of them to command a week in turn. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 262.

Sanguicer, Sanguêça, Zinguizar, etc. n. p. This is a place often mentioned in the Portuguese narratives, as very hostile to the Goa Government, and latterly as a great nest of corsairs. This appears to be Sangameshvar, lat. 17° 9', formerly a port of Canara on the river Shāstrī, and standing 20 miles from the mouth of that river. The latter was navigable for large vessels up to Sangameshvar, but within the last 30 years has become impassable.

1516. "Passing this river of Dabul and going along the coast towards Goa you find a river called Cinguçar, inside of which there is a place where there is a traffic in many wares, and where enter many vessels and small Zambucos of Malabar to sell what they bring, and buy the products of the country. The place is peopled by Moors, and Gentiles of the aforesaid Kingdom of Daquem (Deccan).—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 286.

1538. "Thirty-five leagues from Guoa, in the middle of the Gulf of the Malabars there runs a large river called Zamgizara. This river is well known and of great renown. The bar is bad and very tortuous, but after you get within, it makes amends for the difficulties without. It runs inland for a great distance with great depth and breadth."—De Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, 36.

1553. De Barros calls it Zingaçar in II. i. 4, and Sangaça in IV. i. 14.

1584. "There is a Haven belonging to those rrviers (rovers), distant from Goa about 12 miles, and is called Sanguiseo, where many of those Rovers dwell, and doe so much mischief that no man can passe by, but they receive some wrong by them. . . . Which the Viceroy understanding, prepared an armie of 15 Foists, over which he made chiefe Capitaine a Gentleman, his Nephew called Don Iulianes Mascharenhas, giving him expresse commandement first to goe unto the Haven of Sanguiser, and utterly to raze the same down to the ground."—Linschoten, ch. 92.

1602. "Both these projects he now began to put in execution, sending all his treasures [which, they said exceeded ten millions in gold] to the river of Sanguiser, which was also within his jurisdiction, being a seaport, and there embarking it at his pleasure."—Couto, V. ix. 8.

See also Couto, Dec. X. iv. :

"How D. Gileanes Mascarenhas arrived in Malabar, and how he entered the river of Sanguiser to chastise the Naique of that place; and of the disaster in which he met his death." (This is the event of 1584 related by Linschoten) also Dec. X. vi. 4 :

"Of the things that happened to D. Jeronymo Mascarenhas in Malabar, and how he had a meeting with the Zamorin, and swore peace with him; and how he brought destruction on the Naique of Sanguiser."

1727. "There is an excellent Harbour for Shipping 8 Leagues to the Southward of Dabul, called Sanguseer, but the Country about being inhabited by Raparees, it is not frequented."—A. Ham. 244.

Sanskrit. Add :

1774. "This Code they have written in their own language, the Shanscrit. A translation of it is begun under the inspection of one of the body, into the Persian language, and from that into English."—W. Hastings to Lord Mansfield, in Gleig, i. 402.

Satigam, n. p. Satgāon, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 miles above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the site of a few huts, with a ruined mosque as the only relique of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the silting up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Pequeno (q.v.).

c. 1840. "About this time the rebellion of Fakhrá broke out in Bengal. . . Fakhrá and his Bengali forces killed Kádar Khán (Governor of Lakhnauti) . . . He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Satgānw and Sunárgānw."—Zid ud-din Barání, in Elliot, iii. 243.

1535. "In this year Diogo Rabello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Choromandel fishery, with licence from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his . . . and he went well armed along with two foists which he equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more . . . So this Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satigāon, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandise, selling and buying: and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatigāon, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were also driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Gozil that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King if he chose to liberate the (Portuguese) prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace . . ."—Correa, iii. 649.

Satrap. Add :

1883. "An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. 'Because,' he used to say, 'σατράπης is the Greek for satrap, it does not follow that παράπτης is the Greek for rat-trap.'"—Saturday Review, July 14th, p. 53.

Sayer. Add :

I find that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.) defines :

"Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licences, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses, shops, bazars, &c."

This, of course, throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name, suggested in the Gloss. s.v.

1751. "I have heard that Ramkissen Seat who lives in Calcutta has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxidavad Syre chowkey duties."—Letter from Nawáb to Prest. Fort William, in Long, 25.

1788. "Sairjat—"All kinds of taxation besides the land-rent. Sairs.—Any place or office appointed for the collection of duties or customs."—The Indian Vocabulary, 112.

Scavenger. Add :

1760. "Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of. Agreed we allow him Rs. 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post."—Fort William Consn. In Long, 245.

It does not appear from this what the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case, were.

Scymitar. Add, with reference to the original term shamshūr :

This word (shamshūr) was known to Greek writers. Thus :

A.D. 93. " . . . Καὶ καθίστησι τὸν πρεσβύτατον παῖδα Μορόβαζον βασιλέα περιθεῖσα τὸ διὰ δόγμα καὶ δοῦσα τὸν σημαντήρα τοῦ πατρὸς δακτύλιον, τήν τε σάμνην ἂν ὀνομαζομένην παρ' αὐτοῖς."—Joseph. Antiqq. xx. ii. 3.

c. A.D. 114. "Δῶρα φέροι Τραϊανῷ ὑφάσματα σερικά καὶ σαμνήρας αἱ δέ εἰσι σπάθαι βαρβαρικήαι."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, s.v.

Seedy. Add:

1690. "As he whose Title is most Christian, encouraged him who is its principal Adversary to invade the Rights of Christendom, so did Senor Padre de Pandara, the Principal Jesuite and in an adjacent Island to Bombay, invite the Siddy to exterminate all the Protestants there."—Ovington, 157.

1885. "The inhabitants of this singular tract (Soopah plateau in N. Canara) were in some parts Mahrattas, and in others of Canarese race, but there was a third and less numerous section, of pure African descent called Sidhis . . . , descendants of fugitive slaves from Portuguese settlements . . . the same ebony coloured, large-limbed men as are still to be found on the African coast, with broad, good-humoured, grinning faces."—Gordon S. Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, etc. 32-33.

Seerpaw. Add:

1680. "Answer is returned that it hath not been accustomary for the Governours to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund, except there come therewith a Serpow or a Tasheriffe."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Dec. 2d, in N. & E., No. III. p. 40.

Sepoy. Add:

1682. "As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundellall's to have y<sup>e</sup> Seapy, or Nabob's horseman, consigned to me, with order to see y<sup>e</sup> Pervanna put in execution; but having thought better of it, y<sup>e</sup> Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to y<sup>e</sup> Seapy and Bulchunds Vekeel would be more powerfull and advantageous to me than his own."—Hedges (Hak. Soc.) p. 56.

Here we see the word still retaining the sense of 'horseman' in India.

1738. "The Arab and other inhabitants are obliged, either by long custom . . . or from fear and compulsion, to give the Spahees and their company the mounah . . . which is such a sufficient quantity of provision for ourselves, together with straw and barley for our mules and horses."—Shaw's Travels in Barbary, ed. 1757, p. xii.

1747. The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay, March 16th, "if they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Consn. May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Warwick, and Ilchester, Princess Augusta, "on the 28th inst., from Bombay (bringing) us a General from that Presidency,* as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses, and 100 well-trained Seapoys, all which under the command of Capt. Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer." . . .

And under July 13th. " . . . The Reinforcement of Sepoys being arrived from Tellicherry, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected; and as there is far greater Dependance to be placed on those People than on our own Peons . . . many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, AGREED, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Choicest of them continued in the Service."—MS. Records in India Office.

1763. "Major Carnac . . . observes that your establishment is loaded with the expense of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Sepoy Battalions, whereas such is the nature of Sepoys that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Court's Letter, of March 9th. In Long, 290.

Serai. a. Add:

c. 1584. "At Saraium Turcis palatium principis est, vel aliud amplum aedificium, non a Czar† voce Tatarica, quae regem significat, dictum: vnde Reineccius Saragiam Turcis vocari putet, ut regiam. Nam aliae quoque domus, extra Sultani regiam, nomen hoc ferunt . . . vt ampla Turcorum hospitia, sive diversoria publica, quae vulgo Caravasarias nostri vocant."—Leunclavrus, ed. 1650, p. 403.

Shabunder. Add:

1768. " . . . two or three days after my arrival (at Batavia), the landlord of the hotel where I lodged told me he had been ordered by the shebandar to let me know that my carriage, as well as others, must stop, if I should meet the Governor, or any of the council; but I desired him to acquaint the shebandar that I could not consent to perform any such ceremony . . ."—Capt. Carteret, quoted by transl. of Stavorinus, i. 281.

* Not a general officer, but a letter from this body of the Council.

† On another B.M. copy of an earlier edition than that quoted, and which belonged to Jos. Scaliger, there is here a note in his autograph: "Id est Caesar, non est vox Tatarica, sed Vindica seu Illyrica, ex Latino detorta."

Shaddock. Add:

1803. "The Shaddock, or pumpelmos, often grows to the size of a man's head."—Percival's Ceylon, 313.

Shambogue. Add:

1800. "Shanaboga, called Shanbogue by corruption, and curnum by the Musulmans, is the village accountant."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 268.

Sheeah. Add:

1869. "La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l'Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sunnites et Schiites n'ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Turcs et les Persans . . . ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l'Inde; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n'excitent généralement entre eux aucune animosité."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

Sherbet. Add:

c. 1580. "Et saccharo potum jucundissimum parant quem Sarbet vocant."—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. I., p. 70.

Shiraz, n. p. The wine of Shiraz was much imported and used by Europeans in India in the 17th cent.

1690. "Each Day there is 'prepar'd (at Suratt) a Publick Table for the Use of the President and the rest of the Factory. . . . The Table is spread with the choicest Meat Suratt affords . . . and equal plenty of generous Sherash and Arak Punch. . ."—Ovington, 394.

Sicca. Add:

1779. "In the 2d Term, 1779, on Saturday, March 6th: Judgment was pronounced for the plaintiff. Damages fifty thousand sicca rupees.

" . . . 50,000 Siccá Rupees are equal to five thousand one hundred and nine pounds, two shillings and elevenpence sterling, reckoning according to the weight and fineness of the silver."—Notes of Mr. Justice Hyde on the case Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 243.

Siris. Add:

1808. "Quelques années après la mort de Dariay, des charpentiers ayant abattu un arbre de Seris, qui croissoit auprès de son tombeau, le coupèrent en plusieurs pièces pour l'employer à des constructions. Tout-à-coup une voix terrible se fit entendre, la terre se mit à trembler et le tronc de cet arbre se releva de lui-même. Les ouvriers épouvantés s'enfuirent, et l'arbre ne tarda pas à reverdir."—Afsós, Ardysh-i-Mahfil, quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus., 88.

Sitting up. Add:

1777. "Lady Impey sits up with Mrs. Hastings; vulgo toad-eating."—Ph. Francis's Diary, quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 124.

Sittringy. Add:

1648. " . . . Een andere soorte van slechte Tapijten die mē noemt Chitrenga."—Van Twist, 63,

Slave. We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1676. "Of three Theeves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth."—The Court to Fort St. Geo., March 7th. In Notes and Extracts, No. I., p. 18.

1682. " . . . making also proclamation by beat of drum that if any Slave would run away from us he should be free, and liberty given to go where they pleased."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14th.

1752. "Sale of Slaves . . . . Rs. 10 : 1 : 3."—Among Items of Revenue. In Long, 34.

1763. "We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the West Coast with slaves, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose . . . to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head."—Court's Letter of Dec. 8th. In Long, 293.

1764. "That as inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of Slaves as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every slave shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz., 13s. 4d. a head to the Commander, and 6s. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander is to be allowed the further sum of 6s. 8d. and the Chief Mate 3s. 4d. The Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each slave landed at Fort Marlborough."—Court's Letter, Feb. 22nd. In Long, 366.

1778. Mr. Busteed has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing slaves and slave-girls, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and other offences (Echoes of Old Calcutta, 117 seqq.).

1782. "On Monday the 29th inst. will be sold by auction . . . a bay Buggy Horse, a Buggy and Harness . . . some cut Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugar-candy . . . a quantity of the best Danish Claret . . . deliverable at Serampore; two Slave Girls about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles."—India Gazette, July 27th.

1785. "Malver, Hair-dresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with gauze flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price."—In Seton-Karr, i. 119.

This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794. "50 Rupees Reward for Discovery. "Run off about four Weeks ago from a Gentleman in Bombay, A Malay Slave called Cambing or Raming. He stole a Silk Purse, with 45 Venetians, and some Silver Buttons. . . ."—Bombay Courier, Feb. 22nd.

Snake-stone. Add:

1861. "'Have you been bitten?'"—'Yes, Sahib,' he replied, calmly; 'the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger,' he added, extracting from the recesses of his mysterious bag a small piece of white stone. This he wetted, and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere . . . he apparently suffered no . . . material hurt.

"I was thus effectually convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring, as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake stones are well-known throughout India."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, pp. 91-92.

Sombrero. Add:

Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M.-General Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt it is a corruption (by 'striving after meaning') of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1516. "And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 298.

1553. "At this time Dom Jorge discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro on a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by which token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city) . . ."—Barros, III. x. 9.

Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

1768-71. "Close behind it, followed the heir apparent, on foot, under a sambreel, or sunshade, of state."—Stavorinus, E. T., i. 87.

Sonthals, n. p. Properly Santāls. The name of a non-Aryan people belonging to the Kolarian class, extensively settled in the hilly country to the west of the Hoogly R. and to the south of Bhāgalpūr, from which they extend to Balasore at interval, sometimes in considerable masses, but more generally much scattered. The territory in which they are chiefly settled is now formed into a separate district called Santāl Parganas, and sometimes Santalāia. Their settlement in this tract is, however, quite modern; they have migrated thither from the S.W. In Dr. F. Buchanan's statistical account of Bhāgalpūr and its Hill people, the Santāls are not mentioned.

The earliest mention of this tribe that we have found is in Mr. Sutherland's Report on the Hill People, which is printed in the Appendix to Long. No date is given there, but we learn from Mr. Man's book, quoted below, that the date is 1817.

1817. "For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of lands. . . ."—Sutherland's Report, quoted in Long, 569.

1867. "This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of prosperity which, to my knowledge, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their horde of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah and pettifogging Mooktears, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows:

"To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e. Assistant Commissioner.

* This is apparently a mistake. The proposals were certainly original with Mr. Yule.

"To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

"To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with the witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law."

"These were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognized the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicious, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. . . ."—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by E. G. Man, Barrister-at-Law, &c. Calcutta, 1867, pp. 125-127.

Soorky. Add:

1777. "The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so; some under sentence from him to beat Salkey."—Report of Impey and others, quoted in Stephen's Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 201.

Soursop. Add:

1768-71. "The Sursak-tree has a fruit of a similar kind with the durion (Durian), but it is not accompanied by such a fetid smell."—Stavortinus, E. T., i. 236.

Sowar. Add:

In the Greek provinces in Turkey, the word is familiar in the form σουβάρις, pl. σουβαριδες, for a mounted gendarme.

Sowar, Shooter. Add:

1857. "I have given general notice of the Shutur Sowar going into Meerut to all the Meerut men."—H. Greathed's Letters during Siege of Delhi, 42.

Suákin, n. p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation.

c. 1331. "This very day we arrived at the island of Sawákin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 161-2.

1526. "The Preste continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Maçuha, or in Quaquem, or in Zyla."—Correa, iii. 42.

Sucker-Bucker. Add:

1753. "Vient ensuite Bukor, ou comme il est écrit dans la Géographie Turque, Feker, ville située sur une colline, entre deux bras de l'Indus, qui en font une île . . . la Géographie . . . ajoute que Louhri (i.e. Rori) est une autre ville située vis-à-vis de cette île du côté meridional, et que Seker, autrement Sukor, est en même position du côté septentrional."—D'Anville, p. 37.

Sufeena, s. H. safina. This is the native corr. of subpæna. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word safina for 'a blank-book, a note-book.'

Sultan. Add:

c. 1586.
"Now Tamburlaine the mighty Soldan comes,
And leads with him the great Arabian King."

Marlowe, Tamb. the Great, iv. 3.

Sunderbunds. Add:

1764. "On the 11th Bhaudan, whilst the Boats were at Kerma in Soonderbund, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manjee to put off with the Budgerow. . . ."—Native Letter regarding Murder of Capt. John Rose by a Native Crew. In Long, 383.

This instance is an exception to the general remark at p. 660, col. a, that the English popular orthography has always been Sunder, and not Soonder-bunds.

Supreme Court. The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulating Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the substance of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court. The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the 'High Court,' the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.

The charter of Charles II., of 1661 gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1683 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor's Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council in each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason.

Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1753.

The Mayor's court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1797, when (by 37 Geo. III. c. 142) a Recorder's Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801; and at Bombay in 1823.

Surat. Add:

1779. "There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bender-Souret . . . but the truth of this God knows."—Seir Mutaq., iii. 328.

Surrinjaumee, Gram. H. Grām-saranjāmī, from Skt. grāma 'a village,' and P. saranjām 'apparatus,' etc.; explained in the quotation.

1767. "Gram-Serenjamme, or peons and pykes stationed in every village of the province to assist the farmers in the collections, and to watch the villages and the crops on the ground, who are also responsible for all thefts within the village they belong to. . . . (Rs.) 1,54,521 : 14."—Revenue Accounts of Burdwan. In Long, 507.

Sutledge, n. p. The most easterly of the Five Rivers of the Punjab, the great tributaries of the Indus. H. Satlaj, with certain variations in spelling and pronunciation. It is in Skt. Satadru, Sutudru, Sutudri, Sitadru, etc., and is the Σαπάδος or Σαδάδης of Ptolemy, the Sydrus (or Hesudrus) of Pliny (vi. 21).

c. 1020. "The Sultan . . . crossed in safety the Sihūn (Indus), Jelam, Chandāha, Ubrā (Rāvi), Bah (Bīyāh), and Sataldur. . . ."—Al-Uṭbī, in Elliot, ii. 41.

c. 1030. "They all combine with the Satlader below Mūltān, at a place called Panjnad, or "the junction of the five rivers."—Al-Bīrūnī, in Elliot, i. 48.

The same writer says:

(The name) "should be written Shataludr. It is the name of a province in Hind. But I have ascertained from well-informed people that it should be Sataludr, not Shataludr" (sic).—Ibid., p. 52.

c. 1310. "After crossing the Panjāb, or five rivers, namely, Sind, Jelam, the river of Lohāwar, Satlūt, and Bīyah. . . ."—Wassāf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1380. "The Sultan (Fīroz Shāh) . . . conducted two streams into the city from two rivers, one from the river Junna, the other from the Sutlej."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 300.

c. 1450. "In the year 756 H. (1355 A.D.) the Sultan proceeded to Dībālpūr, and conducted a stream from the river Satlader, for a distance of 40 kos as far Jhajar."—Tārīkh-i-Mubīnāt Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 8.

c. 1582. "Letters came from Lahore with the intelligence that Ibrahim Husain Mirzā had crossed the Satlāda, and was marching upon Dībālpūr."—Tabaqāt-i-Akbarī, in Elliot, v. 358.

c. 1590. "Sūbah Dīhlī. In the 3d climate. The length (of this Sūbah) from Falwal to Lodhiāna, which is on the bank of the River Satlaj, is 165 Kuroh."—Ain (orig.), i. 513.

1793. "Near Moultan they unite again, and bear the name of Setlege, until both the substance and name are lost in the Indus."—Rennell, Memoir, 102.

In the following passage the great French geographer has missed the Sutlej:

1753. "Les cartes qui ont précédé celles que j'ai composées de l'Arie, ou de l'Inde . . . ne marquoient aucune rivière entre l'Hyphasis, ou Hypasis, dernier des fleuves qui se rendent dans l'Indus, et le Gemné, qui est le Jomanes de l'Antiquité. . . . Mais la marche de Timur a indiqué dans cette intervalle deux rivières, celle de Kehker et celle de Panipat. Dans un ancien itinéraire de l'Inde, que Pline nous a conservé, on trouve entre l'Hyphasis et le Jomanes une rivière sous le nom d'Hesidrus à égale distance d'Hyphasis et de Jomanes, et qu'on a tout lieu de prendre pour Kehker."—D'Anville, p. 47.

Suttee. Add:

The conjecture (of Burnell) at p. 667, col. a, in interpretation of the word masti used by P. Della Valle is confirmed, and the traveller himself justified, by an entry in Mr. Whitworth's Dicty. of a word Masti-kalla used in Canara for a monument commemorating a sati. Kalla is stone and masti = mahā-sati.

1713. "Ce fut cette année de 1710, que mourut le Prince de Marava, âgé de plus de quatre-vingt-ans; ses femmes, en nombre de quarante sept, se brûlèrent avec le corps du Prince. . . ." (details follow).—Père Martin (of the Madura Mission), in Lettres Édifiantes, ed. 1781, tom. xii., pp. 123 seqq.

1829. "Regulation XVII.

"A REGULATION for declaring the practice of Suttee, or of burning or burying alive the widows of Hindoos, illegal, and punishable by the Criminal Courts."—Passed by the G.-G. in C., Decr. 4th.

Swally. Add:

1690. "In a little time we happily arriv'd at Sualybar, and the Tide serving, came to an Anchor very near the Shoar."—Ovington, 163.

Sycee. Add:

1779. "The bearer and scise, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Ducarell. I took hold of Mr. Shee and carried him up. The bearer and scise took Mr. Ducarell out. Mr. Keeble was standing on his own house looking, and asked, 'What is the matter?' The bearer and scise said to Mr. Keeble, 'These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out.'—Evidence on Trial of Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 230.

Sycee. Add:

1711. "Formerly they used to sell for Sisee, or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter'd."—Lockyer, 135.

T.

Taj, n. p. The most famous and beautiful mausoleum in Asia; the Taj Mahal at Agra, erected by Shah Jahān over the burial-place of his favourite wife Mumtāzi-Mahal ('Ornament of the Palace') Rānū Begam.

1663. "I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Eckbar, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Taj Mehal, which I am now going to describe to you . . . judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Taj Mehal, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Indianisme; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World. . . ."—Bernier, E. T., 94-96.

1665. "Of all the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Chah-Jehan is the most magnificent; she caus'd it to be set up on purpose near the Tasimacan, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Tasimacan is a great Basar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass'd with Portico's; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. . . . The monument of this Begum or Sultaneess, stands on the East side of the City. . . . I saw the beginning and completing of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 50.

"But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, Seen from old Agra's towering battlements,
And mirrored clear in Jumna's silent stream;
Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem

Set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon
Dims the white marble with a softer light,
Like some queened maiden, veiled in dainty lace,
And waiting for her bridegroom, stately,
pale,
But yet transcendent in her loveliness."
The Banyan Tree.

Talisman. Add, before quotations (From Prof. Robertson Smith): "I have got some fresh light on your Talisman."

"W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alkoran, published (1615) along with the Mohammedis Imposturae, and Arabian Trudgman, has the following, quoted from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: 'Haec precatio (the fātiha) illis est communis ut nobis dominica: et ita quibusdum ad battologiam usque recitatur ut centies idem, aut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Al-hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, et cetera ejus vocabula eodem modo. Idque facit in publicâ oratione Taalima, id est sacrificulus, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut ea repetitione suppleat eorum erroribus. . . . Quidam medio in campo tam assidue, ut defessi consistant; alii circumgirando corpus,' etc.

"Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seems to be tīlima, 'a very learned man.' This, owing to the influence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time tīlima is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talīmi, a shortened form, recognised by Jawhari and other lexicographers, of talāmidh, 'disciples.' That students should turn a penny by saying prayers for others is very natural."

This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

Talook. Add:

1885. "In October, 1779, the Dacca Council were greatly disturbed in their minds by the appearance amongst them of John Doe, who was then still in his prime. One Chundermonee demised to John Doe and his assigns certain lands in the pergunna Bullera . . . whereupon George III., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, commanded the Sheriff of Calcutta to give John Doe possession. At this Mr. Shakspeare burst into fury, and in language which much have surprised John Doe, proposed 'that a sezar be appointed for the collection of Patparrah Talook, with directions to pay the same into Bullera cutcherry.'—Sir J. Stephen, Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 159-60.

A sazawal is "an officer specially appointed to collect the revenue of an estate, from the management of which the owner or farmer has been removed." (Wilson).

Tanadar. Add:

1602. "So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his bastard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabul), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . ."—Couto, IV., i. 9.

Tanga. Add:

See also in SURR. under Pardao.
N.B.—In Gloss. in quotation from Herberstein for pollina read pollina.

Tangun. Add:

1854. "These animals, called Tanghan, are wonderfully strong and enduring; they are never shod, and the hoof often cracks. . . The Tibetans give the foals of value messes of pig's blood and raw liver, which they devour greedily, and it is said to strengthen them wonderfully; the custom is, I believe, general in Central Asia."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, 1st ed., ii. 131.

Tanor, n. p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Tyndis of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin.

1516. "Further on . . . are two places of Moors 5 leagues from one another. One is called Paravanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from these towns is a lord to whom they belong; and he has many Nairs, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc., 153.

1521. "Cotate was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who went to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and casks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, insomuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian. . . ."—Correa, ii. 679.

1528. "And in the year (A.H.) 935, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor. . . . Now the Ray of that place affording aid to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that chieftain having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks."—Tohfut-ul-Mujahideen, E. T., 124-125.

1553. "For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochin after his victory over the Zamorin, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter's vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Zamorin by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal."—Barros, I., vii. 10.

1727. "Four leagues more southerly is Tannore, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans."—A. Ham. i. 322.

Tara, Tare, s. Name of a small silver coin current in Southern India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d., was a tar, generally considered to be a corruption of dirhem.\*

1442. "They cast (at Vijayanagar), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the fanom, which they call tar."—Abdurrazzak in India in the XV. Cent. 26.

1506. (The Viceroy, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet at Cochin). 1754. "There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tyger was baited with Solemnity, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Novelty, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division. . . —A Collection of Letters relating to the E. I. Company, &c. (Tract), 1754, p. 13.

1872. "One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. . . . This was his story:—

"Sahib, I was going along with the letters . . . which I had received from your highness . . . a great tiger came out and stood in the path. Then I feared for my life; and the tiger stood, and I stood, and we looked at each other. I had no weapon but my kukri . . . and the Government letters. So I said, 'My lord Tiger, here are the Government letters, the letters of the Honourable Kumpany Bahadur . . . and it is necessary for me to go on with them.' The tiger never ceased looking at me, and when I had done speaking he growled, but he never offered to get out of the way. On this I was much more afraid, so I kneeled down, and made obeisance to him; but he did not take any more notice of that either, so at last I told him I should report the matter to the Sahib, and I threw down the letters in front of him, and came here as fast as I was able. Sahib, I now ask for your justice against that tiger."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, p. 444.

Tincall. Add:

1525. "Tymquall, small, 60 tangas a maund."—Lembrança, 50.

Tobra. Add:

The H. is tobra.

"In the Nerbudda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobras."—(M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.)

As we should say, 'buckets.'

Tola. Add:

1676. "Over all the Empire of the Great Mogul, all the Gold and Silver is weigh'd with Weights which they call Tolla."—Tavernier, E. T., ii. 18.

Tomaun. Add:

c. 1340. "Ces deux portions réunies formaient un total de 800 toumans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems."—Shihâbuddîn, Masâlak al Adâb, in Notices et Extraits, xiii. 194.

Toolsy. Add, at end of quotations:

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in South Europe.

1885. "I have frequently realized how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystic properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ's grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil's day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. On returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embroideries and silken raiment will be free from the visitation of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period."—J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 328.

Topaz. Add:

It may be a slight support to the derivation from top-chî that Italians were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 16th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510.

Tope-khana. Add:

1687. "The Topchi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Chambers; their Quarters are at Tophana, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople."—Rycaut's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 94.

1726. "Isfandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Daroger of the Tops-canna)."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte) 276.

Toucan. Add:

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given:

1885. "Soopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. . . . I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch; and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball . . . through the head just at its junction with the handsome orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it. Down came the toucan with outspread wings, dead apparently; but when my peon Manoel raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a succession of roars more like a bull than a bird."—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, &c., pp. 37–38.

Towleea. s. H. Tauliya, 'a towel.' This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. toalka (Panjab N. & Q., 1885, ii. 117).

Tribeny. Add :

1753. "Au-dessous de Nudia, à Tripini, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde île renfermée dans la première."—D'Anville, 64.

Trichinopoly. Add :

1753. "Ces embouchures sont en grand nombre, vû la division de ce fleuve en différens bras ou canaux, à remonter jusqu'à Tirishirapali, et à la pagode de Shirangham."—D'Anville, 115.

Trumpak. Add :

1507. "Meanwhile the Captain-Major ordered Afonso Lopes de Costa and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Turumbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some palm-trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water-boats were not arriving, as sometimes happened owing to a contrary wind."—Correia, i. 830.

1682. "Behind the hills, to the S.S.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Turumbake. . . here one sees the ancient pleasure-house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sundry date-palms. There are here also two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Turumbake'; which water is the most wholesome and the freshest in the whole island."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 86.

Tuan, s. Malay tuan and tuwan, 'lord, master.' This word is used in the English and Dutch settlements of the Archipelago exactly as Sāhib is in India.

1533. "Dom Paulo da Gama, who was a worthy son of his father in his zeal to do the King good service . . . equipped a good fleet, of which the King of Ugentana (see Ujungtanah) had presently notice, who in all speed set forth his own, consisting of 30 lancharas, with a large force on board, and in command of which he put a valiant Moor called Tuam-bár, to whom the King gave orders that as soon as our force had quitted the fortress (of Malacca) not leaving enough people to defend it, he should attack the town of the Queleys (see Kling) and burn and destroy as much as he could."—Correia, iii. 486.

1553. "For where this word Raja is used, derived from the kingly title, it attaches to a person on whom the King bestows the title, almost as among us that of Count, whilst the style Tuam is like our Dom; only the latter of the two is put before the person's proper name, whilst the former is put after it, as we see in the names of these two Javanese, Vtimuti Raja, and Tuam Colascar."—Barros, II. vi. 3.

Tuccavee. Add :

1880. "When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it . . . it sold them almost always for a nazarāna. It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced takāvi to the tenant or owner."—Minutes of Sir T. Munro, i. 71.

These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

Tumlook. Add :

1679. In going down the Hoogly: "Before daybreak overtook the Ganges at Barnagur, met the Arrival 7 days out from Ballasore, and at night passed the Lilly at Tumbalee."—Fort St. Geo. (Council on Tour). In Notes and Extracts, No. II., p. 69.

1685. "January 2.—We fell downe below Tumbole River.

"January 3.—We anchored at the Channel Trees, and lay here y<sup>e</sup> 4th and 5th for want of a gale to carry us over to Kedgeria."—Hedges, Diary (Hak. Soc.), 175.

Turban. Add :

1588. "In this canoa was the King's Secretarie, who had on his head a piece of died linen cloth folded vp like vnto a Turkes Tuliban."—Cavendish, in Hakluyt, iv. 337.

Turkey. Add :

Tyconna. Add :

"The throng that accompanied that minister proved so very great that the floor of the house, which happened to have a Tah-Qhana, and possibly was at that moment under a secret influence, gave way, and the body, the Vizir, and all his company fell into the apartment underneath."—Seir Mutagherin, iii. 19.

Typhoon. Add :

1375. "But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blew so fiercely upon us, that it wound our great Sail round about our main Mast . . . These Winds arise from a Wind that is called by the Greeks Typhon; and Pliny calleth it Vertex and Vortex; but as dangerous as they are, as they arise suddenly, so quickly are they laid again also."—Rauwolf's Travels, in Ray's Collection, ed. 1705, p. 320.

Here the traveller seems to intimate (though we are not certain) that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds ; in any case it was exactly the tūfān of India.

1615. "And about midnight Capt. Adams went out in a bark aboard the Hoseander with many other barks to tow her in, we fearing a tuffon."—Cocks's Diary, i. 50.

1853. "... pointing as he spoke to a dark dirty line which was becoming more and more visible in the horizon :

" 'By Jove, yes !' cried Stanton, 'that's a typhaon coming up, sure enough.'"—Oakfield, i. 122.

1859. "The weather was sultry and unsettled, and my Jemadar, Ramdeen Tewarry . . . opined that we ought to make ready for the coming tuphan or tempest . . . . A darkness that might be felt, and that no lamp could illumine, shrouded our camp. The wind roared and yelled. It was a hurricane."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, p. 62.

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that in the GLOSSARY from Couto (723, col. b) respecting the Oiho de Boi :

1885. "The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of 'lady's eyebrows,' so called from their being curved in a narrow black-arched wisp, and these most surely foretold the approach of the tornado."—Ibid. 176.

Ujungtanah. Add:

1554. "... en Muar, in Ojantana . . ."—Botelho, Tombo, 105.

Upas. Add before quotations, p. 729, col. a :

Lindley, in his Vegetable Kingdom, in a short notice of Antiaris toxicaria, says that, though the accounts are greatly exaggerated, yet the facts are notable enough. He says cloth made from the tough fibre is so acrid as to verify the Shirt of Nessus.

My friend Gen. MacLagan, noticing Lindley's remark to me, adds : "Do you remember in our High School days (at Edinburgh) a grand Diorama called The Upas Tree ? It showed a large wild valley, with a single tree in the middle, and illustrated the safety of approach on the windward side, and the desolation it dealt on the other."

Then place among the quotations the following :

1885. "The dreaded Upas dropped its fruits.

"Beneath the shady canopy of this tall fig no native will, if he knows it, dare to rest, nor will he pass between its stem and the wind, so strong is his belief in its evil influence.

"In the centre of a tea estate, not far off from my encampment, stood, because no one could be found daring enough to cut it down, an immense specimen, which had long been a nuisance to the proprietor on account of the lightning every now and then striking off, to the damage of the shrubs below, large branches, which none of his servants could be induced to remove. One day, having been pitchforked together and burned, they were considered disposed of ; but next morning the whole of his labourers awoke, to their intense alarm, afflicted with a painful eruption . . . . It was then remembered that the smoke of the burning branches had been blown by the wind through the village. . . ." (Two Chinamen were engaged to cut down and remove the tree, and did not suffer ; it was ascertained that they had smeared their bodies with coco-nut oil).—H. O. Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 112-113.

1868. "The Church of Ireland offers to us, indeed, a great question, but even that question is but one of a group of questions. There is the Church of Ireland, there is the land of Ireland, there is the education of Ireland . . . . they are all so many branches from one trunk, and that trunk is the Tree of what is called Protestant ascendancy . . . . We therefore aim at the destruction of that system of ascendancy, which, though it has been crippled and curtailed by former measures, yet still must be allowed to exist ; it is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land so far as its shadow can extend ; it is still there, gentlemen, and now at length the day has come when, as we hope, the axe has been laid to the root of that tree, and it nods and quivers from its top to its base . . . ."—MR. GLADSTONE'S Speech at Wigan, 23rd Oct., 1868.

In the preceding quotation the orator indicates the Upas tree without naming it. The name was supplied by some commentators referring to this indication at a later date :

1873. "It was perfectly certain that a man who possessed a great deal of imagination might, if he stayed out sufficiently long at night, staring at a small star, persuade himself next morning that he had seen a great comet ; and it was equally certain that such a man, if he stared long enough at a bush, might persuade himself that he had seen a branch of the Upas Tree."—Speech of Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE ON the 2nd reading of the University Education (Ireland) Bill, 3d March, 1873.

1873. "It was to regain office, to satisfy the Irish irreconcilables, to secure the Pope's brass band, and not to pursue 'the glorious traditions of English Liberalism,' that Mr. Gladstone struck his two blows at the Upas tree."—MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, in Fortnightly Review, Sept. 1873, pp. 289-90.

Urz and Urzee. Add:

1782. "Monsr. de Chemant refuses to write to Hyder by arzasht (read arzasht), and wants to correspond with him in the same manner as Mons. Duplex did with Chanda Sahib; but the Nabob refuses to receive any letter that is not in the stile of an arzee or petition."—India Gazette, June 22d.

Venetian. Add:

1542. "At the bottom of the cargo (? cifa), among the ballast, she carried 4 big guns (tiroes), and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Coje Cafar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming."—Correa, iv. 250.

Vettyver, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil Vettiveru.

1800. "Europeans cool their apartments by means of wetted tats (see Tatty) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the wattie waeroo, which, when wetted, exhales a pleasant but faint smell."—Heyne's Tracts, p. 11.

Vizier, Wuzeer, s. Ar. H. Wazir, a minister, and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahommedan) prince.

In India the Nawab of Oudh was long known as the Nawab Wazir, the founder of the quasi independent dynasty having been Sa'adat 'Ali Khan, who became Subadar of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Wazir of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawab Wazir merged in that of pād-shāh, or King, assumed by Ghāzi-ud-din Haidar in 1820, and still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wājid 'Ali Shāh, under surveillance in Calcutta.

As most titles degenerate, Wazir has in Spain become alguazil, 'a constable,' in Portuguese alvasil, 'an alderman.'

1614. "Il primo visir, sopra ogni altro, che era allora Nasuh bascià, genero del Gran Signore, venne ultimo di tutti, con grandissima e ben adorna cavalcata, enfin della quale andava egli solo con molta gravità."—P. della Valle (from Constant.), i. 43.

Wali. Add, under b:

1869. "Quant au titre de pir . . . il signifie proprement vieillard, mais il est pris dans cette circonstance pour désigner une dignité spirituelle équivalente à celle des Gurū Hindous . . . Beaucoup de ces pirs sont à leur mort vénérés comme saints; de là le mot pir est synonyme de Wali, et signifie Saint aussi bien que ce dernier mot."—Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. dans l'Inde, 23.

Wanderoo. Add:

1874. "There are just now some very remarkable monkeys. One is a Macaque . . . Another is the Wanderoo, a fellow with a great mass of hair round his face, and the most awful teeth ever seen in a monkey's mouth. This monkey has been credited with having killed two niggers before he was caught; he comes from Malabar."—F. Buckland, in Life, p. 289.

West Coast. See also SUPPT. s.v. Slave.

White Jacket. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner, and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years, obsolete. But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849.

1803. "It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which were well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth."—Lord Valentia, i. 240.

Winter. Add:

1513. "And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Qurrate) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (pelo que envernarão), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two foists and other vessels, and in one of these was the ganda (i.e. the rhinoceros, see Ganda), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa . . . —Correa, ii. 373.

1653. "Dans les Indes il y a deux Estez et deux Hyuers, ou pour mieux dire vn Printemps perpetuel, parce que les arbres y sont tousiours verds: Le premier Esté commence au mois de Mars, et finit au mois de May, qui est le commencement de l'Hyuer de pluye, qui continue iusques en Septembre pleuvant incessamment ces quatre mois, en sorte que les Karauanes, ny les Fatmars (see Pattamar, a) ne vont ne viennent: l'ay esté quarante iours sans pouoir sortir de la maison . . . Le second Esté est depuis Octobre iusques en Decembre, au quel mois il commence à faire froid . . . ce froid est le second Hyuer qui finit au mois de Mars."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 244-245.

Woolock. Add:

1799. "We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy wullocks of Bengal."—Symes, Ara, 233.

Woon, s. Burm. wun, 'a governor or officer of administration'; literally 'a burden,' hence presumably the 'Bearer of the Burden.' Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.:

Woon-gyee, i.e. 'Wun-gyi' or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hlot-dau (see in SUPPL. Lotoo):

Woon-douk; i.e. Wun-dauk, lit. 'the prop of the Wun'; a sort of Adlatus, or Minister of an inferior class.

We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as "M. Woondouk."

Atwen-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household.

Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May-woon of Symes).

Ye-wun, 'Water-Governor,' formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (Ray-woon of Symes).

Akaok-wun, Collector of Customs (Akawoon of Symes).

1540. "This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated with the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Negapatam I have often seen more than 700 sail take cargoes of rice for India, cargoes amounting to more than 20,000 moiss* of rice . . . This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of S. Thomé did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and jagra (see Jaggery), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be boiled in their houses, and gave it boiled down in the water to the people to drink, all for the love of God . . . This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Bismagar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and the beneficence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an ola of thanks (see Ollah) to the residents of San Thomé. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Straits, that in Aden a load (fardo) of rice fetched forty xarafts, each worth a cruzado . . . —Correia, iv. 131-132.

Xercansor, n. p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mahomedan names. Xercansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Sher Khān Sar, the

c. 1538. "But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him . . . and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then leaving everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great array, having with him a Patan Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Behar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more search than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333. Cotoxa (Koto sha) appears to be Kutb Khān of the Mahomedan historian there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mahomedan king of Malacca by Barros, Xaquem Darxā (ii. 6. 1), by Albuquerque Xaquendarxa (Comm. Pt. III. ch. 17). This name is rendered by Lassen's ponderous lore into Skt. Sakanadhara, "d. h. Besitzer kraftiger Besinnungen" (or "Possessor, of strong recollections"—Ind. Alt. iv. 546), whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sikandar Shāh! For other examples, see in Gloss. Codovascan.

Zebu. Add:

In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Ze'-ba . . . 1. hump of a camel, zebu, etc." Curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice.

Zend and Zendavesta.

Zend is the name which has been commonly applied, for the last hundred years or more, to that dialect of ancient Iranian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zand when used alone in the Parsi books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Haug thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if by Zend the translator meant his own work.

No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parsi books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of those scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gāthas or hymns are written; and a later one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zand, in Haug's view, may be referred to the root zan, 'to know'; Skt. ṛñā, Gr. γνώ, Lat. gno (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zannda, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, "as the Pahlavi books always style them Avistāk va Zand (Avesta and Zend)" * i.e. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastā, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistūn; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Haug.) Thus, 'Avesta and Zend' signify together 'The Law and the Commentary.'

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parsi tradition is that there were twenty-one books called Nasks, the greater part of which were burnt by alexander in his conquest of Persia ; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the Zendâddâd, a compilation of religious laws and of mythical tales ; (b) the Vîspârad, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice ; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 5 hymns or Gâthas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year, and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771.

c. 930. "Zarâdasht, the son of Asbimâm . . . had brought to the Persians the book al-Bastâh in the old Fârsi tongue. He gave a commentary on this, which is the Zand, and to this commentary yet another explanation which was called Bazand. . . " — Ma'sûdî, ii. 167.

c. 1030. "The chronology of this same past, but in a different shape, I have also found in the book of Hamza ben Alhusain Alisfahâni, which he calls 'Chronology of great nations of the past and present.' He says that he has endeavoured to correct his account by means of the Abastâ, which is the religious code (of the Zoroastrians). Therefore I have transferred it into this place of my book." — Al-Bîrûnî, Chronology of Ancient Nations, by Sachau, 112.

"Afterwards the wife gave birth to six other children, the names of whom are known in the Avastâ." — Id., p. 108.

1630. "Desirous to add anything to the ingenious that the opportunities of my Travayle might conferre vpon mee, I ioyned myselfe with one of their Church men called their Daroo, and by the interpretation of a Parsee, whose long employment in the Companies Service, had brought him to mediocrity in the English tongue, and whose familiarity with me, inclined him to further my inquiries : I gained the knowledge of what hereafter I shall deliver as it was compiled in a booke writ in the Persian Characters containing their Scriptures, and in their own language called their ZVND-DAVASTAVV." — Lord, The Religion of the Persees, The Proem.

1653. "Les ottomans appellent gueuvres une secte de Payens que nous connoissons sous le nom d'adorateurs du feu, les Persans sous celui d'Atehpères, et les Indous sous celui de Parisi, terme dont ils se nommēt eux-mesmes. . . Ils ont leur Saincte Escripture ou Zundeuastavv, en deux volumes composée par vn nommé Zertost, conduit par vn Ange nommé Abraham ou plus-tost Bahaman Vmshauspan. . . " — De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, pp. 200-201.

1700. "Suo itaque Libro (Zerdusht) . . alium affixit specialem Titulum Zend, seu alias Zendavestâ ; vulgus sonat Zund et Zundavastaw. Ita ut quamvis illud ejus Opus variis Tomis, sub distinctis etiam nominibus, constet, tamen quidvis ex dictorum Tomorum quovis, satis propriè et legitime citari possit, sub dicto generali nomine, utpote quod, hac ratione, in operum ejus complexu seu Syntagmate contineri intelligatur. . . Est autem Zend nomen Arabicum : et Zendavestâ conflatum est ex superaddito nomine Hebraeo-Chaldaico, Eshta, seu Esta, i.e. ignis, unde Eoria. . . supra dicto nomine Zend apud Arabes, significatur Igniarium seu Focile. . . Cum itaque nomine Zend significetur Igniarium, et Zendavestâ Igniarium et Ignis, etc." — T. Hyde, Hist. Religionis Vet. Persarum eorumque Magorum, cap. xxv., ed. Oxon. 1760, pp. 335-336.

1771. "Persuadé que les usages modernes de l'Asie doivent leur origine aux Peuples et aux Religions qui l'ont subjuguée, je me suis proposé d'étudier dans les sources l'ancienne Théologie des Nations habituées dans les Contrées immenses qui sont à l'Est de l'Euphrate, et de consulter sur leur Histoire, les livres originaux. Ce plan m'a engagé à remonter aux Monumens les plus anciens. Je les ai trouvé de deux espèces : les premiers écrits en Samskretan ; ce sont les Vedes, Livres sacrés des Pays, qui de l'Indus s'étendent aux frontières de la Chine : les seconds écrits en Zend, ancienne Langue du Nord de la Perse ; c'est le Zend Avesta, qui passe pour avoir été la Loi des Contrées bornées par l'Euphrate, le Caucase, l'Oxus, et la mer des Indes." — Anquetil du Perron, Zend-Avesta, Ouvrage de Zoroastre—Documens Préliminaires, p. iii.

"Dans deux cens ans, quand les Langues Zend et Pehlvi seront devenues en Europe familières aux Savans, on pourra, en rectifiant les endroits où je me serai trompé, donner une Traduction plus exacte du Zend-Avesta, et si ce que je dis ici excitant l'émulation, avance le terme que je viens de fixer, mes fautes m'auront conduit au but que je me suis proposé." — Id., Preface, xvii.

1884. "The supposition that some of the books were destroyed by Alexander the Great is contained in the introductory chapter of the Pehlvi Vîraf-Nama, a book written in the Sassanian times, about the 6th or 7th century, and in which the event is thus chronicled :—'The wicked, accursed Guna Mino (the evil spirit), in order to make the people sceptical about their religion, instigated the accursed Alexiedar (Alexander) the Ruman, the inhabitant of Egypt, to carry war and hardships to the country of Iran (Persia). He killed the monarch of Iran, and destroyed and made desolate the royal court. And this religion, that is, all the books of Avesta and Zend, written with gold ink upon prepared cow-skins, was deposited in the archives of Stakhar (Istakhar or Persepolis) of Papak. The accursed, wretched, wicked Ashmogh (destroyer of the pious), Alexiedar the evil-doer, took them (the books) out and burnt them."—Dosambhat Framji, H. of the Parsis, ii. 158-159.
